

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CAPE COLONY REBELS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Cape Ministry have forwarded through the Governor to Her Majesty's Government any Minute with respect to the treatment of those subjects of Her Majesty who have been arrested for political offences as distinguished from acts of war; and whether he will lay a copy of such Minute upon the Table.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I have received a Minute from the Cape Ministers respecting the treatment of rebels in that colony to which apparently the hon. Member refers; though it does not quite answer his description. Indeed, I do not see how "an act of war" could be predicated of a rebel. I am not prepared to lay a copy upon the Table at present, as the matter is still under discussion with the Cape Government.

ALDERSHOT MANŒUVRES — HEAT FATALITIES—ARMY CLOTHING.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask whether the War Office has taken any steps to call to account those responsible for the fatalities and casualties amongst the troops in the operations near Aldershot on Monday, owing to exposure to the great heat in unsuitable uniforms and headgear, and whether steps will be taken which would prevent such unreasonable exposure in future.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The General Officer commanding, Aldershot, was instructed by telegraph to send a full report on these very regrettable incidents. He has despatched the report, and if the hon. Member will repeat his question to-morrow I shall be able to give the House some information.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN MOVEMENT—"BOXER" DISTURBANCES, ETC.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I have to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give the House any information as to the state of affairs in China.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think perhaps the most convenient course will be for my right hon. friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs to make a statement upon the subject.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): Before the right hon. Gentleman makes his statement, I desire to ask him a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether Her Majesty's Government will endeavour, in concert with other Powers, to arrange for the deposition of the Dowager-Empress and the restoration of Kwangtsu as Emperor of China; whether Her Majesty's Government have provided for the protection of the Tientsin-Peking and Tientsin-Shan-hai-kwan railways by stationing armed guards along the railway tracks; whether Her Majesty's Government will without further delay place an adequate number of suitable gunboats on the Yang-tze and West rivers for the protection of British trade and whether Her Majesty's Government are taking all necessary steps to prevent the punishment of Chinese in consequence of having rendered assistance to British concessionnaires.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): In answer to the questions of the right Gentleman and the hon. Member for Barnsley it is, I think, desirable to state briefly to the House the course of recent events at Peking, although I am afraid I cannot gratify his curiosity by a statement as to the policy of the Government regarding the deposition of the Dowager Empress. Her Majesty's Minister at Peking has been in constant communication with the Chinese Government since the attack made by Boxers on peace converts and the destruction of villages about ninety miles from Peking on 12th May. On 18th May Sir Claude MacDonald reminded the Yamen of unceasing warnings during the last months of the danger of not taking adequate measures to suppress the Boxer movement. An Imperial Decree was consequently issued. On 20th May a meeting of the Corps Diplomatique was held, and a resolution unanimously adopted calling on the Yamen to take more stringent measures. It was not then considered necessary to bring guards to Peking, but the British Marine guard at Tientsin, which had been under orders to leave, was retained there. Two British ships were sent to Ta-ku. After specific measures having been taken by the Yamen, on 26th May the Corps Diplomatique met again, and it was decided, failing a satisfactory reply from the Yamen, to send for guards. This course was adopted on 28th May, and a British detachment of seventy-eight men with a machine gun was at once sent to Peking and 104 men to Tientsin. Four British ships were brought to Tientsin from Wei-hai-wei. News was then received of Mr. Robinson's murder and the capture of Mr. Norman, who was subsequently murdered. The British Minister continued till 5th June to urgently press upon the Yamen the necessity of taking instant and effective steps to punish the murderers of Mr. Robinson, to secure the release of Mr. Norman, and to restore order, and informed them that Her Majesty's Government would be the Chinese Government responsible for the criminal apathy which had brought about this disgraceful state of affairs. These remonstrances having no effect, and the situation both in Peking and the neighbourhood becoming more threatening, Her Majesty's Government on 6th June telegraphed instructions to Her Majesty's Minister and to Admiral Seymour to take, in concert with other Powers, any steps which in their discretion, which was left unfettered, they might consider advisable for the protection of the Foreign Legations at Peking, and of British subjects there or at Tientsin and in the neighbourhood. Her Majesty's Minister, after conference with the Russian representative at Peking, was empowered to support any Chinese authority capable of maintaining law and order or any measures to this end—the Russian Minister being similarly authorised. The General Officer commanding Hong Kong and the Straits Settlements was ordered, in the event of the Admiral requiring troops for service at Peking, to send whatever troops could be spared from his command, and was informed they would be replaced. In consequence of further depredations by the Boxers, Admiral Seymour called up three more ships, and on 9th inst., after consultation with the foreign Commanders, decided to land a force and march on Peking. On 10th inst. he marched with 1,078 men, of whom 650 were British. By subsequent reinforcements the force has been raised to 2,300, obtaining detachments from the ships of the seven Powers represented, about 900 of them being British. The Admiral advanced thirty miles on 11th instant, at which date he encountered the Boxers and killed thirty-five of them. The railway being much broken up, only three miles were made during the succeeding twenty-four hours, but there was no further engagement. Nine hundred and fifty troops are being embarked from Hong Kong, and the "Terrible" will leave Hong Kong for Ta-ku. The Russians are landing an additional force of 1,700 men. Sir Claude MacDonald reports on 11th June that disorders are occurring in Peking, and the British summer Legation in the hills, which was in the custody of the Chinese Government, had been destroyed by fire. Nine British ships and, it is believed, twenty-five foreign ships are now at Ta-ku. Steps have been taken to secure additional force on the Yang-tze for the preservation of life and property. Complete accord prevails between the Powers as to the action taken by the Admiral.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): The right hon. Gentleman referred to a consultation with the Russian Minister at Peking. Does he mean us to understand that there is a closer arrangement between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Russia than there is with the Governments of other Powers?

MR. BRODRICK: No, Sir; I had not the least intention of giving that idea.

ASHANTI—NATIVE RISING—INVESTMENT OF COOMASSIE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give the House any information with regard to the state of affairs in Ashanti.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe all the information at the disposal of the Colonial Office has been already made public through the ordinary channels of information, and my right hon. friend near me tells me that no information of any sort has reached the Colonial Office since this morning.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is not literally correct. I have received a telegram, but it does not contain any fresh information.

LONDON, WALTHAMSTOW, AND EPPING FOREST RAILWAY ACT, 1894.

MR. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, by the London, Walthamstow, and Epping Forest Railway Act, 1894, a company was incorporated to make a railway from London through Leyton and Walthamstow to increase the railway accommodation for those populous districts, and that Acts have since been passed from time to time extending the time allowed for the completion of the railway, in view of the promoters' stated intention to abandon the undertaking unless such Acts were passed, three Bills having been introduced into this House in five years for the abandonment of the undertaking and subsequently withdrawn; and whether, as a Bill, which was read the first time in this House on 9th February last, is now before the House again seeking a further extension of time, and upon which no further steps

QUESTIONS.

REBELS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Cape Ministry have forwarded through the Governor to Her Majesty's Government any Minute with respect to the treatment of those subjects of Her Majesty who have been arrested for political offences as distinguished from acts of war; and whether he will lay a copy of such Minute upon the Table.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I have received a Minute from the Cape Ministers respecting the treatment of rebels in that colony to which apparently the hon. Member refers; though it does not quite answer his description. Indeed, I do not see how "an act of war" could be predicated of a rebel. I am not prepared to lay a copy upon the Table at present, as the matter is still under discussion with the Cape Government.

ALDERSHOT MANŒUVRES — HEAT FATALITIES—ARMY CLOTHING.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask whether the War Office has taken any steps to call to account those responsible for the fatalities and casualties amongst the troops in the operations near Aldershot on Monday, owing to exposure to the great heat in unsuitable uniforms and headgear, and whether steps will be taken which would prevent such unreasonable exposure in future.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. WYNDHAM, Dover): The General Officer commanding, Aldershot, was instructed by telegraph to send a full report on these very regrettable incidents. He has despatched the report, and if the hon. Member will repeat his question to-morrow I shall be able to give the House some information.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN MOVEMENT—"BOXER" DISTURBANCES, ETC.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I have to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give the House any information as to the state of affairs in China.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think perhaps the most convenient course will be for my right hon. friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs to make a statement upon the subject.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): Before the right hon. Gentleman makes his statement, I desire to ask him a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether Her Majesty's Government will endeavour, in concert with other Powers, to arrange for the deposition of the Dowager-Empress and the restoration of Kwangtsu as Emperor of China; whether Her Majesty's Government have provided for the protection of the Tientsin-Peking and Tientsin-Shan-hai-kwan railways by stationing armed guards along the railway tracks; whether Her Majesty's Government will without further delay place an adequate number of suitable gunboats on the Yang-tsze and West rivers for the protection of British trade; and whether Her Majesty's Government are taking all necessary steps to prevent the punishment of Chinese in consequence of having rendered assistance to British concessionaires.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): In reference to the questions of the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Barnsley it is, I think, desirable to state briefly to the House the course of recent events at Peking, although I am afraid I cannot gratify his curiosity by a statement as to the policy of the Government regarding the deposition of the Dowager Empress. Her Majesty's Minister at Peking has been in constant communication with the Chinese Government since the attack made by Boxers on peaceable converts and the destruction of three villages about ninety miles from Peking on 12th May. On 18th May Sir Claude MacDonald reminded the Yamen of his unceasing warnings during the last six months of the danger of not taking adequate measures to suppress the Boxers. An Imperial Decree was consequently issued. On 20th May a meeting of the Corps Diplomatique was held, and a resolution unanimously adopted calling on the Yamen to take more stringent measures. It was not then considered necessary to bring guards to Peking, but the British Marine guard at Tientsin, which had been under orders to leave, was retained there. Two British ships were sent to Ta-ku. No specific measures having been taken by the Yamen, on 26th May the Corps Diplomatique met again, and it was decided, failing a satisfactory reply from the Yamen, to send for guards. This course was adopted on 28th May, and a British detachment of seventy-eight men with a machine gun was at once sent to Peking and 104 men to Tientsin. Four more British ships were brought to Ta-ku from Wei-hai-wei. News was then received of Mr. Robinson's murder and the capture of Mr. Norman, who was subsequently murdered. The British Minister continued till 5th June to urgently press upon the Yamen the necessity of their taking instant and effective steps to punish the murderers of Mr. Robinson, to secure the release of Mr. Norman, and to restore order, and informed them that Her Majesty's Government would hold the Chinese Government responsible for the criminal apathy which had brought about this disgraceful state of affairs. These remonstrances having no effect, and the situation both in Peking and the neighbourhood becoming more threatening, Her Majesty's Government on 6th June telegraphed instructions to Her Majesty's Minister and to Admiral Seymour to take, in concert with other Powers, any steps which in their discretion, which was left unfettered, they might consider advisable for the protection of the Foreign Legations at Peking, or of British subjects there or at Tientsin or in the neighbourhood. Her Majesty's Minister, after conference with the Russian representative at Peking, was empowered to support any Chinese authority capable of maintaining law and order or any measures to this end—the Russian Minister being similarly authorised. The General Officer commanding Hong Kong and the Straits Settlements was ordered, in the event of the Admiral requiring troops for service at Peking, to send whatever troops could be spared from his command, and was informed they would be replaced. In consequence of further depredations by the Boxers, Admiral Seymour called up three more ships, and on 9th inst., after consultation with the Foreign Commanders, decided to land a force and march on Peking. On 10th inst. he marched with 1,078 men, of whom 650 were British. By subsequent reinforcements the force has been raised to 2,300, containing detachments from the ships of the seven Powers represented, about 900 of them being British. The Admiral had advanced thirty miles on 11th instant, on which date he encountered the Boxers and killed thirty-five of them. The railway being much broken up, only three miles were made during the succeeding twenty-four hours, but there was no further engagement. Nine hundred and fifty troops are being embarked from Hong Kong, and the "Terrible" will leave Hong Kong for Ta-ku. The Russians are landing an additional force of 1,700 men. Sir Claude MacDonald reports on 11th June that disorders are occurring in Peking, and the British summer Legation in the hills, which was in the custody of the Chinese Government, had been destroyed by fire. Nine British ships and, it is believed, twenty-five foreign ships are now at Ta-ku. Steps have been taken to secure additional force on the Yang-tze for the preservation of life and property. Complete accord prevails between the Powers as to the action taken by the Admiral.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): The right hon. Gentleman referred to a consultation with the Russian Minister at Peking. Does he mean us to understand that there is a closer arrangement between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Russia than there is with the Governments of other Powers?

MR. BRODRICK: No, Sir; I had not the least intention of giving that idea.

ASHANTI—NATIVE RISING—INVESTMENT OF COOMASSIE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give the House any information with regard to the state of affairs in Ashanti.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe all the information at the disposal of the Colonial Office has been already made public through the ordinary channels of information, and my right hon. friend near me tells me that no information of any sort has reached the Colonial Office since this morning.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is not literally correct. I have received a telegram, but it does not contain any fresh information.

LONDON, WALTHAMSTOW, AND EPPING FOREST RAILWAY ACT, 1894.

MR. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, by the London, Walthamstow, and Epping Forest Railway Act, 1894, a company was incorporated to make a railway from London through Leyton and Walthamstow to increase the railway accommodation for those populous districts, and that Acts have since been passed from time to time extending the time allowed for the completion of the railway, in view of the promoters' stated intention to abandon the undertaking unless such Acts were passed, three Bills having been introduced into this House in five years for the abandonment of the undertaking and subsequently withdrawn; and whether, as a Bill, which was read the first time in this House on 9th February last, is now before the House again seeking a further extension of time, and upon which no further steps have been taken by the company, the Board of Trade will take any steps to compel the company either to perform its statutory duty or to forthwith abandon the undertaking.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): Yes, Sir. I have received from the agents for the promoters of the undertaking a statement of reasons for the delay referred to, which I shall be happy to show the hon. Member, if he so desires. In answer to the last part of the question I have to point out that on the 25th of May the House agreed to a resolution reported from the Standing Orders Committee that leave should be given for the introduction of a Bill to abandon the undertaking. I am informed that the Abandonment Bill will accordingly be introduced forthwith.

MIDLAND RAILWAY—FATALITY IN BRECON GOODS YARD.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the rider to the verdict of a coroner's jury at Brecon, respecting the fatal accident to a Midland goods guard named William Burley, to the effect that the jury were unanimously of opinion that the attention of the Board of Trade should be called to the dangerous state of the Brecon goods yard and to the fact that several accidents had previously happened near the same place; and whether he will at once order an inquiry to be held into the working arrangements at the shunting yard.

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir. I have seen the rider referred to, and the Board of Trade have ordered an inquiry into the causes of the recent accident.

CATTERLINE EPISCOPAL SCHOOL—DISMISSAL OF HEAD MISTRESS.

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Education Department has received notice of the dismissal of the head mistress of Catterline Episcopal School; whether he is aware that her conduct, character, and attention to duty have been reported on as satisfactory, both by Her Majesty's inspector and by the managers of the school; and whether, as she has accepted the Superannuation Act, and will be deprived of its advantages unless she finds another situation, he will make investigation whether her dismissal by the managers was justifiable; and if found not to be so, will he suspend the next annual grant.

MR. HAYES FISHER (Fulham) (for the LORD ADVOCATE): In answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question, I have to state that no official notification of the teacher's dismissal has been received, but the Department has to-day received a letter from the teacher stating that she has received notice of dismissal. In regard to the second paragraph, the Department has received satisfactory testimonials about the teacher from the managers, and a good report from the inspector. As to the third paragraph, the effect of a dismissal in regard to pension can only be regulated by the provisions of the Superannuation Act, and that Act gives the Department no power to interfere in the manner suggested.

STRANGFORD LOUGH LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware of the refusal of the Irish Lights Commission to comply with the request of the inhabitants in and the traders within the district of Strangford Lough to provide a light or beacon in the lighthouse which has been erected more than half a century, and if any and what steps can be taken to compel the Irish Lights Commissioners to provide this light; and will he recommend an application to the Board of Trade for further consideration of the application, in view of the present destruction of the lighthouse at Donaghadee.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): Since this question was placed on the Paper I have been in communication on the subject with my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade, and am informed by him that the lighthouse on Rock Angus, Strangford Lough, was erected before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and before the present mode of managing lighthouses came into existence. At that time the Irish Lighthouse Board paid for local lights out of the dues on the passing trade (a practice much complained of), and this practice was discontinued by the Merchant Shipping Acts of 1853 and 1854. The lighting of the beacon on Angus Rock would, I am informed, only prove a benefit to the local trade frequenting the Lough, and if carried out should not be done at the expense of the General Lighthouse Fund. With respect to the destruction of the Donaghadee lighthouse, it may be stated that a light of the same character as that shown from the lighthouse previous to its destruction has been exhibited since the night following the casualty.

IRISH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION PROGRAMME.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain why the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act programme, which is usually issued before Easter in each year, has not yet been issued for 1901, and is nearly three months overdue; whether he is aware of the inconvenience of this delay to, and the probable loss it will entail on, educational establishments at the next examinations, because the usual information as to the course of studies has not been published; and whether he can say when this programme will be published, and what it is proposed to do to insure the various educational establishments concerned against monetary loss, because of the delay in publishing the programme.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It has already been stated by me that when the programme for 1901 was under consideration in December last the Board of Intermediate Education determined to defer its final settlement until Parliament had considered the proposed legislation. At a meeting of the Board held on the 31st ultimo it was decided to submit to the Lord Lieutenant the rules and programme for 1901 without further delay, and on the same lines as in previous years. The rules and programme have since been approved by the Lord Lieutenant, and will very shortly be published. No material change having been introduced by the rules and programme for next year, the inconvenience or loss referred to in the question cannot arise.

THE COMPANIES BILL.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Companies Bill embodies the Amendments said by the Government to be required in the laws which govern limited liability companies which were placed first in the Government programme at the beginning of the session; and whether, seeing that similar Bills have been introduced every session by the Government for several years past in the House of Lords, it is his intention to proceed with the Bill in the present session; and, if so, whether he can now say when the Second Reading will be taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot name any day at present for the Second Reading of this Bill.

ORDER OF SUPPLY.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is in a position to fix a day for the discussion of any one of the principal Votes in Supply, such as that for the Home Office, that for the Foreign Office, or that for Shipbuilding.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it will be expedient to leave my reply to this question till Monday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have to put to the First Lord of the Treasury the usual question as to the business of the House for next week.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On Monday I propose to take, as is usual at this time of the year, a motion for the time of the House, except Wednesday, the 20th inst., and Wednesday, the 27th inst., which will be reserved, according to usage, for the later stages of Private Bills which have already passed the Second Reading stage. After that has been disposed of I propose to take the Committee stage of the Australian Commonwealth Bill, and the three subsequent Orders will be the Railways (Prevention of Accidents) Bill, the Land Charges Bill, and the Burial Grounds Bill. On Tuesday I shall ask the House to consider Army Estimates in Supply, in order to provide funds necessary for carrying on the war in South Africa. On Thursday I propose to take the Ecclesiastical Assessments (Scotland) Bill first. Information as to subsequent Orders I will give on a later day.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): Are all the outstanding Army Votes to be brought on on Tuesday, or will some be deferred to enable a later discussion on the Army Estimates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Army Votes which will be taken first on Tuesday are Nos. 6 and 7. In no case do I propose to take the whole of the Army Votes, because that would remove from the House the possibility of discussing questions of military policy in Supply before the end of the session, which I think would be an inconvenient course.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: Are we to understand that there will be a Supplementary Estimate presented on Tuesday?

MR. WYNDHAM: As far as I know there is no probability of our requiring an additional Estimate for the war.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I meant to convey was that it was the war in South Africa that rendered it necessary for us to get money at once.

MR. D. A. THOMAS: Will the right hon. Gentleman reconsider his decision with regard to taking private Members' time, so as to except Tuesday week, when I have down a resolution regarding our national coal supply?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): And there is also one affecting the Incorporated Law Society. Do the Government propose to take the Savings Banks Bill to-night?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not to-night.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): Will any business except Supply be taken on the allotted days?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No Government business other than Supply is taken on allotted days.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): What Votes in Supply will be taken to-morrow? Will the right hon. Gentleman postpone those referring to the Woods and Forests Office and the Public Record Office, in which some Welsh Members are interested?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: After the Education Estimates are disposed of we shall proceed with Class 2. I shall be pleased to postpone the two Votes referred to.

POST OFFICE SITES [EXPENSES].

Committee to consider of authorising the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of all sums payable by the Postmaster General under any Act of the present session to enable Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire lands for the public service, and of all expenses incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of such Act (Queen's Recommendation signified), To-morrow.—(Mr. Ritchie.)

PUBLIC LIBRARIES BILL [Lords].

RAILWAYS (PREVENTION OF ACCIDENTS) BILL.

(In the Committee.)

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1900-1.

CLASS IV.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,585,099, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Board of Education, and of the various Establishments connected therewith, including sundry Grants-in-aid."

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): Attempts have been made in some quarters during recent years to introduce into the discussion on such occasions as this questions of a trivial and personal character; but the attention of Parliament has not been thereby diverted from the serious and important facts which it has been my duty to lay before them. The facts have been considered and discussed by Parliament, by local bodies, by the public press, and remedies for the evils laid before Parliament have been suggested, and, in some cases, have been carried into execution. I think that on this occasion I can best occupy the time of the House by pointing out the conditions that will have to be fulfilled if the great reforms embodied in the Code of the present year, by which a single block grant is to be substituted for the separate payments which are made for various subjects of instruction, is to have practical effect. It is a great mistake to speak of that measure, the measure in the Code, as if it were an accomplished reform. It is rather of a negative than of a positive character. The provisions of the Code will remove the obstacles which prevent the establishment of a better system of instruction, but of themselves they do not accomplish that result. Progress is now possible, but the effect of the provisions of the Code is rather to permit it and not to ensure it. Now, in the first place, the policy of Her Majesty's Government must be seconded by the managers of schools. That has not always hitherto been the case. Her Majesty's Government having abandoned the system of individual examination, many school boards and many of the Voluntary associations have rushed into the breach and have of their own accord established a system of individual examination. Bishop Butler says, "Of education information is really the least part"; but these authorities act as if information was the whole object of education, and they employ the teachers in cramming into the children a number of facts which are afterwards disgorged by the diocesan or the School Board inspector in the shape of personal examination. Her Majesty's Government believe that a system of that kind is extremely detrimental to education, and I should like to read to the Committee the observations made by one of our inspectors. This applies to Voluntary schools, but the same thing applies to the case of the Board schools. The inspector says—

"A portion of each school's aid has been in some instances allotted to the payment of an 'organising visitor,' whose visits are quite unnecessary and not always wished for by the managers or teachers. Such visits, which, I am told, frequently result in individual examination of the old and worst type, cannot, except in the case of a bad school, do any good, and very frequently do much harm, tending as they do to throw the progressive teachers back into the old and evil path of cramming for results."

But to carry out the policy of the Government it is not only necessary that the managers of schools should be willing to co-operate, but also that the co-operation should be active and intelligent. I am sorry to say that that also has not always been the case. In the beginning of this year a deputation of rural school teachers came to see me—they were quite leading men of their class—and with them I had a most interesting and most instructive conversation about the possibilities of better teaching for rural schools. The other day I received from one of these teachers a letter in which the writer said—

"I proposed a few days ago to take my scholars through the fields to notice the blossoms of timber and fruit trees. I had a note from my manager to the effect that there is very little educational benefit to be obtained by taking children into fields. The farmers and labourers laugh at the proposal."

It is obvious from this that this teacher's efforts to secure a better kind of teaching for the children were nipped in the bud. I should like to call attention to how very differently these things are done in America. I quote from Mr. Salmon, of the Swansea Training College, who recently visited America—

"There is much out-door work everywhere I happened to reach Chicago during the first days of spring, and half the class-rooms of one school which I visited were empty in consequence of the children being gardening or watching the budding trees. In Central Park, New York, I saw several groups in charge of their teachers, and the sight was obviously common, for I was almost the only one who turned to look at it."

But not only is it necessary that we should have active managers; something must be done also to improve the supply of teachers. Now the mainstay of the supply of teachers is our pupil teachers' system. That system is unique. It is only in this country, in Great Britain and Ireland alone, that such a system for the supply of teachers exists. Of course, the system is so prevalent and so extensive in this country that it is impossible to change it, certainly hastily. The only thing to be done is to improve the system. But when you try to improve the system it is not only the Government but the managers of the schools themselves that are on the horns of a dilemma. If you leave things as they are, children in the rural schools can hardly ever attain to the training college, and will never become leading members of the profession of teaching, except in those few isolated cases where children of ability and energy force their way through all the obstacles that have to be encountered. As far as I know, only one or two reforms have been effected in the position of pupil teachers, since I became Vice-President of the Council. One was to slightly raise the age at which children are admitted pupil teachers up to the still very early age of fifteen; and another is the restriction of the hours during which they might be employed in the schools to twenty hours a week. Just think what that means! It means all the secular time during which the school is opened; and a child who has to work in school for twenty hours a week has only the rest of its time to carry on its education and to develop those faculties which are necessary in a teacher of the young. A further attempt was made last year to impel those interested in the employment of pupil teachers to ensure their being properly educated. But if this sort of reforms are initiated by the Education Department, or by the managers of the schools, or are carried into effect, they will destroy the pupil-teacher system in rural schools. One of the school inspectors says—

“The naked and lamentable fact is that the regulations of the Department—the wise and humane regulations—which limit the hours of work for pupil teachers, are leading to their disappearance from the Voluntary schools. Under the School Board, which had for a long time acted upon the half-time system, and which does not reckon pupil teachers as necessary upon the effective staff, these regulations have, of course, fallen short of the previous practice. But in Voluntary schools which are staffed down to a minimum, or but slightly above it, and where consequently pupil teachers are in charge of classes, it is obviously to the immediate interest of managers and head teachers—in the daily working of their time-table—to make arrangements which will avoid the dislocation caused by the pupil teachers leaving the school for their work at central classes. And thus it comes that the pupil-teacher system seems likely to wither away among the Voluntary schools here. Managers find it difficult to obtain them, and the head teachers don't want them, and there is a substitute at hand. I fancy that my lament will be echoed in any district in England. The teacher under Article 68 is rapidly becoming mistress of the situation.”

Sir J. Gorst.

The pupil teachers under the most favourable circumstances are taught: they are not educated to teach: they are simply prepared for examination. I should be glad to send to any Member who cares to see it a set of pupil-teachers' examination papers. He will see how ridiculous is the information which these children are expected to acquire; and, secondly, how ignorant they are on all the subjects on which they are taught. I think the papers will show how it is almost impossible under the present system that you can have a supply of teachers educated and trained who are fit to carry out the improved system which the institution of the block grant renders possible. I have often told the House that the rural pupil teachers who have not the advantage of central classes are not, and cannot be, so well crammed as the town pupil teachers, who find their way to the training colleges. I have here statistics which prove the truth of that. I find that in the last Queen's scholarship examinations, of the men, in the first class only 4 per cent. and in the second class only 8·2 per cent. had served their time in rural schools; and of the women, in the first class, out of 2,070 candidates, only 74, or 3·8 per cent., and of the second class only 10·6 per cent. had been educated in rural schools, thus showing that in the training colleges, where the best of the teacher's education is finished, the rural pupil teacher is practically only conspicuous by his absence. Now, if Parliament really intend to have teachers properly trained and properly fitted for the work they have to do, they must pick the children out of the elementary or higher elementary schools when they are of a proper age; they must send them with scholarships to the secondary schools as they are trying to do in Wales, and they must have a sufficient supply of training colleges in which to train these young teachers as soon as they are fit to be trained. I now come to the question of the training colleges. At Christmas, 1899, 2,904 men presented themselves for examination. Of these 532 got into the first class, 897 into the second class, 1,126 into the third class, and 349 failed altogether. Of the women who presented themselves for examination, 2,070 got into the first class, 3,992 into the second class, and 2,583 into the third class; 1,644 failed altogether. But of those who succeeded in the examinations a great many teachers failed to get into the training colleges for want of room. I find that of the men who showed a desire to obtain admission to training colleges—2,838 in number—only 1,042 got in; 223 failed not because of failure in their examination, but because of lack of accommodation, and the remainder failed because of their insufficient educational standard. The case of the women is far worse. Of the 3,968 who desired to get into training colleges, 1,575 got in, and 1,369, though qualified, failed to get in through lack of accommodation. Thus one half of them were unable to get the training they desired for themselves. Every training college in the country is absolutely full. There are two sorts of training colleges—residential and day training colleges. There is a good deal of difference of opinion whether the training in the residential college or the training in the day college is, on the whole, the most advantageous. The objections which are taken against the residential college are that the students are shut up with persons of the same age and the same education, having in view the same profession in life, that the tendency of the system is to narrow their perception, and that they fail to get that liberal education which is so desirable. The objection to the day training college is that the students are not sufficiently under observation, and that it is on moral grounds, on grounds of character, undesirable to leave them so much to themselves. Neither of these objections necessarily applies to either the one kind of college or the other. There is a residential college at Cheltenham where the young ladies who go to be trained are mixed up with the girls of the rest of the school. They are not distinguished from them in any way, and they have the advantage of belonging to a very fine high school, in which there is a very good tone, and which is in every way a desirable place for the education of young women. They do not get that narrowing of opinion which they might get in a place where they were all shut up together. Nor is the objection to the day training college at all necessary. At both Cambridge and Oxford the young men who are in the day training colleges there are generally members of colleges, where they have the advantage of association with their college companions and where they are under the college discipline. Those who are not members of colleges (and they are comparatively few) are under the Board of Studies of Oxford and Cambridge, which looks after the non-collegiate students. I was once taken to a hostel at Cardiff where there were a number of young women belonging to the day training college who were boarded and lodged with young ladies who were studying in the college and were in no respect distinguished from their companions, who were going into other professions and had other views in life, and, no doubt, they were as well taken care of as the students in the best training college in England. One would think that in these circumstances the Government had better leave the matter free, and had better leave students to adopt whichever kind of training they themselves or their friends or parents think to be for the best. But for some reason or other the State now pays, and has always paid, more for a teacher being trained in a residential college than in a day training college, and as it is the day training college which is most easily expanded, and which can be most easily made to accommodate more students, I think a very easy reform would be to even the thing all round—that the State should give a definite sum for the training of a teacher, and leave it to the young teacher and his friends to decide in what particular establishment he should prepare himself. The real fact is that there is no such thing as a Queen's "scholarship." It is not a scholarship in the ordinary sense in which a county, or college, or university scholarship is a scholarship. It is an undertaking on the part of the State to pay a sum of money to the institution in which the young person is trained, and I believe that if an arrangement were made by which the whole thing was levelled all round, you might establish two classes of scholarship. I do not know that it is so much to the interest of the State to train a young person who has taken only a second class as one who has taken a first class. It is just and right that the first class should have the larger scholarship, and if the second class students choose to go on in the profession, their friends should find something towards their maintenance in the training school. Anyhow, I am quite certain that the only way in which you can make a large and immediate extension of training college accommodation is by putting the day training students on the same footing as the residential students, and inviting the University Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge and other institutions for the education of young people to extend their day training college accommodation and so increase the number of places. But you not only want more places in your colleges; you want a greater elasticity in the curriculum of the colleges themselves. I cannot understand why teachers should all be educated and trained upon one single model. You do not do it in your university. There one man goes in for literary studies, another man for science, and another man for mathematics, and if you are going to have rural teachers to carry out any of those schemes which have been discussed during the last few months in the press, of teaching children more by observation and by a kind of elementary science than by mere reading, writing, and grammar, you no doubt require a special kind of training. At present the efforts of the trained teacher in the rural schools are not always very successful. The rural schools are chiefly staffed by town-bred teachers, who, having passed a less favourable examination, are obliged to take a rural school as a kind of pis aller. They generally go there passing the time until they can do something better for themselves. One of the inspectors told me he heard, in a large infant Board school, the head-mistress, giving a lesson on the rabbit, tell her class that another name for the rabbit was the hare. And at another Board school in the same place the same inspector heard a teacher inform her class that cows' horns were made of ivory, and she wrote ivory with great complacency on the blackboard. But without these extravagant instances, this is the kind of way in which the teaching is too often done by the present trained teacher. This is the sort of way in which agriculture and horticulture have been taught.

"The scholars," says the inspector, "read books in class on agriculture and horticulture for half an hour. They then copy a portion of the lesson in exercise books or the teacher dictates a summary of it, and this is called science! Nothing is done to cultivate the power of observation, and there are no experiments."

Some persons have said that you want to have an inferior class of teachers for rural schools. No, you do not want an inferior class of teachers, but you want a class of teachers who are trained to teach in rather a different manner from that in which town children are taught. A country child cannot receive abstract knowledge as easily as the town child does. First, the children want their powers of observation, which are generally very good, developed and brought out. They want to learn how to find out facts for themselves, and, finally, they want, what they can easily do in the country, to apply their knowledge to some particular and concrete purpose. There are three types of teacher we can conceive of. There is, first of all, the present teacher, who, in his place and with the kind of children to whom his teaching is suitable, is extremely good; then there is the rural teacher, who teaches by observation and experiment; and, finally, there is the kindergarten teacher, who is to teach the very young; and I cannot see why an arrangement should not be made by which all these kinds of teachers should be produced for our children and be properly trained in proper institutions so as to be able to carry out the instruction which is best. Now I come to the children. There is no use having a block system unless your children are able to come to school under circumstances in which they can benefit by the teaching. First of all there are the infants' schools. I think the very name of infants' school is an absurdity. Infants ought not to be at school, but at play. In our country we begin our attempts at education a great deal too soon, just as we leave off a great deal too soon. I met at Whitsuntide in the Tyrol a fine young fellow who told me with great pride that he was six years of age and had never been inside a school, but that he was going this autumn after the long summer holidays were over, and then he would remain at school, really attending school, going there every day, and staying the whole time until he was fourteen years of age. I could not help contrasting the lot of that little fellow with the lot of the ordinary English country boy. He is cooped up in school as soon as he is three years old, when he had much better be playing about in the lanes or fields. He has a quantity of information crammed into him which his little brain is quite incapable of assimilating—often by the assistance of the cane—and he is taken out of school at eleven or twelve years to labour for the rest of his life. The fact really is that infants' schools are what one of the inspectors called some of them—they are storage places for babies. And they are instituted not so much for the benefit of the children as to enable the mothers of the children to have leisure to go to work. If the State chooses to establish nurseries of this kind we should make them nurseries, and we should assimilate the teachers of the youngest children, at all events, to nurses. When an inspector talks about "the lower babies' mental arithmetic leaves much to be desired," I should certainly like to punish severely any teacher who can be proved to have tried to teach mental arithmetic to babies. I should say that the age of six is quite early enough to attempt to exercise the human brain, and that at six, and from six to eight, the kindergarten system of teaching is the only one which is really suitable for these tender children. No doubt there are many children who have the good fortune to fall into the hands of women who are highly trained in the kindergarten system, and who not only do no harm to the children but do them an immense amount of good, but how many of these poor, helpless babies fall into the hands of such good teachers? An inspector says—

"At an outlying infants' school (Flockwell Heath, average about eighty) among the hills, I asked for the help of a monitor for the babies' class. The next year I found a 'cretin' in charge of this class, a harmless semi-imbecile who had herself remained at the school among the infants until she was fifteen. When she left, the headmistress wanting someone to keep the babies quiet when she could not attend to them, and being unable to get anything out of the Board, put on this poor thing and paid her threepence a week out of her own pocket, knowing that she would be kind at all events. Thus I found an 'infant' aged fifteen one year, and promoted next year to be paid monitor."

Well, another great objection to these infants' schools is that there are so many older children in them. I think the Committee will, perhaps, agree with me that eight is a very liberal superior age for a school infant. Out of two million infants in our schools there were 3,543 under three years of age, and there were no less than 320,923 who were over seven years of age. I have got a list of the schools in which there are children over eight. In one school in Cheshire, which heads my list, there were no less than 31·8 of the infants over eight years of age. There are no less than sixteen schools which have over 20 per cent. of infants over eight, and it is the presence of these infants over eight which renders absolutely necessary that severe discipline which has been referred to.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): Are all these schools in the same district?

SIR J. GORST: Oh no, they are not in the same district. They are scattered all over England. Passing from the infant schools, I think the whole Committee will agree with what I said—and as to which I was asked so much last year—that the State having provided free education, school buildings, and teachers, the least we can expect from the parents is that they will send their children to school in a fit state to receive the instruction which the State has provided, and the children ought not to be sent to school to receive instruction in an unfit state, either through hunger or through fatigue caused by undue labour out of school hours. As regards the feeding of children it is the general opinion that this is a matter which should be left altogether to private charity, and that the school authorities should not deal with it. I got into a great scrape last year by enumerating some opinions that it was the duty of the school authorities to see that the children were fed before they were taught. I am quite willing to agree that children should be fed by charitable agencies if they can be, but it seems to me that if you compel children to go to school and compel them to receive instruction, then you have the obligation thrown upon you to make some provision by which those children shall be sent to school in a fit state. This is not a private duty thrown on the parent, it is a public duty which the State has a right to insist on being fulfilled; and, if proper laws are made and a proper administration of the law carried into effect, I believe the cases in which children would be sent to school unfed and unfitted to receive instruction would be extremely rare. One or two examples made of negligent parents would prevent the recurrence of the offence. It is not the poor parent—it is very seldom extreme poverty which causes the trouble as to underfed children. It is generally idleness, or drunkenness, or carelessness on the part of the parents which is at the bottom of the mischief, or it is greediness for the small earnings of the children. It is not, I say, the poor, but the negligent parent, who is the real offender. I believe that posterity will view with surprise and wonder the state of affairs in this matter, and will marvel how this generation was so stupid as to tolerate it. I must observe that our official statistics are vitiated by the fact that we include in the average attendances children between three and five. I hope that in future will be avoided, as the average attendance can be arrived at by comparing the attendance of children above five years of age on the book of the school. As to children between three and five, not only are the parents at liberty to send them or not as they choose, but I venture to say that the best parents will not send their children before the school age. A good mother will not allow her tender child to go to school before five. Another matter to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee is how the percentage of attendances is arrived at. It is arrived at by taking the average attendance through the year and comparing it with the number on the books on a particular day, very often the last day of the year. That must obviously lead to very erroneous results, because, from some cause, there might be such shifting of the population as would give misleading results as to attendance. There would be a bad attendance made. On the other hand, if a large number of immigrants came into a parish at the end of the year and the children attended the school, that would show a very good attendance; but I have no doubt that the errors in this respect probably answer one another. Everybody knows why the attendance is so varied. In the first place, the maximum fine is so small for neglect; and I will place before the Committee two examples of how the present law works out. They are mentioned by one of the inspectors in his report. He says—

“I mention the following case as typical, not exceptional. A certain family are supposed to attend Paddington St. Mary Magdalene's School. There are three girls and one boy. Since July, 1897, the parents have been fined 5s. for each girl, and in their case the fine has been effective. For the son they have been summoned five times, but, as the fine is only 5s. and John earns 10s. a week helping a coster, he and his parents agree that breaking the law is more profitable than obeying it.”

Here is another case in another inspector's report in London. He says—

“The parent has been summoned, convicted, and actually fined, and (which is not always the case) made to pay the fine, which amounted to 3s. 6d., for continued gross neglect of the attendance law. ‘And how,’ I asked the teacher, ‘is the child doing now?’ ‘Oh,’ she said, ‘she has only begun to attend this week, for she was not allowed by her parents to come last week. They kept her at work because, as they said, she had first to earn the amount of the fine.’”

Well, here is another case showing how it is sought to support the law—

“During the last four months a colleague and myself have been the attendance committee of the Board. We investigated 317 cases of irregularity, 4,580 visits were made by the attendance officer, and after repeated adjournments for improvement we brought four cases before the magistrates. No. 1, no attendance out of 68; No. 2, no attendance out of 68; No. 3, 22 attendances out of 35; No. 4, 27 attendances out of 35. All the cases were adjourned, attendance orders being made, and the School Board had to pay 8s. a case for the luxury of bringing the defaulters before the magistrate.”

It is evident that with the law as it stands a very much better attendance could be secured. There were cases in 1887 where the attendance was 76 per cent.; it is now 92 per cent., and I believe it has never been less since 1893, entirely owing to the energy of the attendance officer. The other day a deputation from the National League of Teachers waited on my noble friend the President of the Council, and immediately after that deputation, quite unsought for by me, I received from the manager of a rural school in Cambridgeshire a letter, in which he stated that he had requested the schoolmaster to work out the total of the attendances at that school. Everything was against them to start with; the mothers went out to work at a steam laundry or a jam factory. Yet with great patience the efforts made had yielded good results. The number on the roll on the previous year gave an average attendance of 98, 96, and 98, and so on. There is a reluctance on the part of the authorities to be severe, and a great deal is expected from patience and persuasion. The percentages are 98, 97, 99, and 98. They may occasionally be smaller in consequence of whooping-cough, heavy snows, feasts in surrounding villages, or scarlet fever, but there are only three weeks in the whole year in which the attendance is less than 97 per cent. That shows what a schoolmaster backed up by a good manager can do even under the present law. At Askrigg, a village in Wensley Dale, where some children have long distances to travel, an energetic master was very successful in getting good attendance. On the occasion of a local sheep-washing the vicar met a boy going to school, and asked him how it was. "Why, sir," the youth replied, "if I went to t' sheep-washing t' master would go clean off his head." Now as to inspectors. This new system will give an inspector no increase of his direct power. He still will act entirely under the orders of the Education Department, and any action of his can be appealed against; but it will give him enormously increased influence and responsibility. In the first place it will be his duty to give advice to teachers and managers of schools as to what they can do, and as to what it is expedient for them to do; and he will be particularly qualified to give this advice because, going all over the schools of the neighbourhood, he has the opportunity of seeing good work in one place which may be imitated in another. I have a remarkable case here. There has been a good deal of talk recently about school gardens; and this is a letter to the county council of Essex from a schoolmaster in Essex—

"My gardening class was first established in 1895, so it has been in operation five years. The garden is about one rood in extent, and is worked as a whole, not in single plots, by the class. The class varies in number, according to the number of eligible boys, as they must be in Standard IV. and upwards. The average number, however, is fourteen or fifteen, which is as many as one man can successfully superintend. The crops grown are those of an ordinary kitchen garden, and such as would be grown in the lads' gardens at home. About half the total area is given over to fruit cultivation, gooseberries, currants, raspberries, and strawberries. Apple culture is taught from my own fruit borders. Flower culture is not neglected, as the boys plant and prune roses, plant bedding plants, etc., and keep the lawn and edges trim. In fact, most of the work in a good general garden (except greenhouse and hothouse work) is done here by the lads. My aim is not so much to turn out 'horticulturists' as to make the lads take an interest in their own gardens at home, and to work these on proper principles. We take elementary botany as a class subject, and the scientific lessons therein learnt are illustrated as much as possible in the plant life of the garden. I may say that there is no lesson that the boys enjoy more than their Friday afternoon gardening lesson, and it has materially helped to improve the attendance on Friday. When I mention that in our local show last year (embracing four parishes) we exhibited in the amateurs' and open classes ten exhibits, and the prize record was nine firsts and one second, you may judge that our school garden is not to be despised in the local competition. I am sorry I have no lad eligible to apply for a horticultural scholarship. There is such a dearth of country houses in this immediate neighbourhood that very few boys go in for gardening as an occupation."

The inspector, spreading about his district the example of an undertaking of this kind, can do enormous good. There are many who might not have the ability to invent such a scheme, but they can imitate it. Then the duty of an inspector will be occasionally to put his veto on proposals of managers and teachers. But that veto will be rarely exercised. It is seldom that the inspectors discourage even an experiment in the schools; and if any inspector were to veto any plan which he ought not to veto there is always the Education Department to appeal to. Therefore I do not think that the interference of inspectors is very much to be feared, while their advice and counsel will be of immense advantage to schoolmasters and managers. To perform duties of that kind we ought to have a most excellent staff of inspectors. The present staff of inspectors was organised under a different system in the days of payment by results, and consisted of inspectors who looked after the schools, and of sub-inspectors who did the rough work of individual examination, and saved the inspectors a certain amount of fatigue in work of that kind. Now, all inspectors have the same functions, and might be better divided into seniors and juniors. An inspector ought to be a man of very liberal education, to have his mind and faculties very well developed, and to have considerable knowledge of the history of education, not only in this country, but in other countries; and he ought to have some experience himself of teaching. But, above all, you want an inspector of character—an inspector who has sufficient independence to dare to tell the truth, because all central authorities like to reward people who prophesy smooth things. Since the time of the prophet who announced to Ahab impending death, disagreeable truths have always been punished with affliction rather than welcomed with reward. Inspectors should be appointed for life. I have

QUESTIONS.

REBELS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Cape Ministry have forwarded through the Governor to Her Majesty's Government any Minute with respect to the treatment of those subjects of Her Majesty who have been arrested for political offences as distinguished from acts of war; and whether he will lay a copy of such Minute upon the Table.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I have received a Minute from the Cape Ministers respecting the treatment of rebels in that colony to which apparently the hon. Member refers; though it does not quite answer his description. Indeed, I do not see how "an act of war" could be predicated of a rebel. I am not prepared to lay a copy upon the Table at present, as the matter is still under discussion with the Cape Government.

ALDERSHOT MANŒUVRES — HEAT FATALITIES—ARMY CLOTHING.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask whether the War Office has taken any steps to call to account those responsible for the fatalities and casualties amongst the troops in the operations near Aldershot on Monday, owing to exposure to the great heat in unsuitable uniforms and headgear, and whether steps will be taken which would prevent such unreasonable exposure in future.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The General Officer commanding, Aldershot, was instructed by telegraph to send a full report on these very regrettable incidents. He has despatched the report, and if the hon. Member will repeat his question to-morrow I shall be able to give the House some information.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN MOVEMENT—"BOXER" DISTURBANCES, ETC.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I have to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give the House any information as to the state of affairs in China.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think perhaps the most convenient course will be for my right hon. friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs to make a statement upon the subject.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): Before the right hon. Gentleman makes his statement, I desire to ask him a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether Her Majesty's Government will endeavour, in concert with other Powers, to arrange for the deposition of the Dowager-Empress and the restoration of Kwangtsu as Emperor of China; whether Her Majesty's Government have provided for the protection of the Tientsin-Peking and Tientsin-Shan-hai-kwan railways by stationing armed guards along the railway tracks; whether Her Majesty's Government will without further delay place an adequate number of suitable gunboats on the Yang-tsze and West rivers for the protection of British trade; and whether Her Majesty's Government are taking all necessary steps to prevent the punishment of Chinese in consequence of having rendered assistance to British concessionnaires.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): In reference to the questions of the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Barnsley it is, I think, desirable to state briefly to the House the course of recent events at Peking, although I am afraid I cannot gratify his curiosity by a statement as to the policy of the Government regarding the deposition of the Dowager Empress. Her Majesty's Minister at Peking has been in constant communication with the Chinese Government since the attack made by Boxers on peaceable converts and the destruction of three villages about ninety miles from Peking on 12th May. On 18th May Sir Claude MacDonald reminded the Yamen of his unceasing warnings during the last six months of the danger of not taking adequate measures to suppress the Boxers. An Imperial Decree was consequently issued. On 20th May a meeting of the Corps Diplomatique was held, and a resolution unanimously adopted calling on the Yamen to take more stringent measures. It was not then considered necessary to bring guards to Peking, but the British Marine guard at Tientsin, which had been under orders to leave, was retained there. Two British ships were sent to Ta-ku. No specific measures having been taken by the Yamen, on 26th May the Corps Diplomatique met again, and it was decided, failing a satisfactory reply from the Yamen, to send for guards. This course was adopted on 28th May, and a British detachment of seventy-eight men with a machine gun was at once sent to Peking and 104 men to Tientsin. Four more British ships were brought to Ta-ku from Wei-hai-wei. News was then received of Mr. Robinson's murder and the capture of Mr. Norman, who was subsequently murdered. The British Minister continued till 5th June to urgently press upon the Yamen the necessity of their taking instant and effective steps to punish the murderers of Mr. Robinson, to secure the release of Mr. Norman, and to restore order, and informed them that Her Majesty's Government would hold the Chinese Government responsible for the criminal apathy which had brought about this disgraceful state of affairs. These remonstrances having no effect, and the situation both in Peking and the neighbourhood becoming more threatening, Her Majesty's Government on 6th June telegraphed instructions to Her Majesty's Minister and to Admiral Seymour to take, in concert with other Powers, any steps which in their discretion, which was left unfettered, they might consider advisable for the protection of the Foreign Legations at Peking, or of British subjects there or at Tientsin or in the neighbourhood. Her Majesty's Minister, after conference with the Russian representative at Peking, was empowered to support any Chinese authority capable of maintaining law and order or any measures to this end—the Russian Minister being similarly authorised. The General Officer commanding Hong Kong and the Straits Settlements was ordered, in the event of the Admiral requiring troops for service at Peking, to send whatever troops could be spared from his command, and was informed they would be replaced. In consequence of further depredations by the Boxers, Admiral Seymour called up three more ships, and on 9th inst., after consultation with the Foreign Commanders, decided to land a force and march on Peking. On 10th inst. he marched with 1,078 men, of whom 650 were British. By subsequent reinforcements the force has been raised to 2,300, containing detachments from the ships of the seven Powers represented, about 900 of them being British. The Admiral had advanced thirty miles on 11th instant, on which date he encountered the Boxers and killed thirty-five of them. The railway being much broken up, only three miles were made during the succeeding twenty-four hours, but there was no further engagement. Nine hundred and fifty troops are being embarked from Hong Kong, and the "Terrible" will leave Hong Kong for Ta-ku. The Russians are landing an additional force of 1,700 men. Sir Claude MacDonald reports on 11th June that disorders are occurring in Peking, and the British summer Legation in the hills, which was in the custody of the Chinese Government, had been destroyed by fire. Nine British ships and, it is believed, twenty-five foreign ships are now at Ta-ku. Steps have been taken to secure additional force on the Yang-tsze

for the preservation of life and property. Complete accord prevails between the Powers as to the action taken by the Admiral.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): The right hon. Gentleman referred to a consultation with the Russian Minister at Peking. Does he mean us to understand that there is a closer arrangement between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Russia than there is with the Governments of other Powers?

MR. BRODRICK: No, Sir; I had not the least intention of giving that idea.

ASHANTI—NATIVE RISING—INVESTMENT OF COOMASSIE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give the House any information with regard to the state of affairs in Ashanti.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe all the information at the disposal of the Colonial Office has been already made public through the ordinary channels of information, and my right hon. friend near me tells me that no information of any sort has reached the Colonial Office since this morning.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is not literally correct. I have received a telegram, but it does not contain any fresh information.

LONDON, WALTHAMSTOW, AND EPPING FOREST RAILWAY ACT, 1894.

MR. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, by the London, Walthamstow, and Epping Forest Railway Act, 1894, a company was incorporated to make a railway from London through Leyton and Walthamstow to increase the railway accommodation for those populous districts, and that Acts have since been passed from time to time extending the time allowed for the completion of the railway, in view of the promoters' stated intention to abandon the undertaking unless such Acts were passed, three Bills having been introduced into this House in five years for the abandonment of the undertaking and subsequently withdrawn; and whether, as a Bill, which was read the first time in this House on 9th February last, is now before the House again seeking a further extension of time, and upon which no further steps have been taken by the company, the Board of Trade will take any steps to compel the company either to perform its statutory duty or to forthwith abandon the undertaking.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): Yes, Sir. I have received from the agents for the promoters of the undertaking a statement of reasons for the delay referred to, which I shall be happy to show the hon. Member, if he so desires. In answer to the last part of the question I have to point out that on the 25th of May the House agreed to a resolution reported from the Standing Orders Committee that leave should be given for the introduction of a Bill to abandon the undertaking. I am informed that the Abandonment Bill will accordingly be introduced forthwith.

MIDLAND RAILWAY—FATALITY IN BRECON GOODS YARD.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the rider to the verdict of a coroner's jury at Brecon, respecting the fatal accident to a Midland goods guard named William Burley, to the effect that the jury were unanimously of opinion that the attention of the Board of Trade should be called to the dangerous state of the Brecon goods yard and to the fact that several accidents had previously happened near the same place; and whether he will at once order an inquiry to be held into the working arrangements at the shunting yard.

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir. I have seen the rider referred to, and the Board of Trade have ordered an inquiry into the causes of the recent accident.

CATTERLINE EPISCOPAL SCHOOL—DISMISSAL OF HEAD MISTRESS.

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Education Department has received notice of the dismissal of the head mistress of Catterline Episcopal School; whether he is aware that her conduct, character, and attention to duty have been reported on as satisfactory, both by Her Majesty's inspector and by the managers of the school; and whether, as she has accepted the Superannuation Act, and will be deprived of its advantages unless she finds another situation, he will make investigation whether her dismissal by the managers was justifiable; and if found not to be so, will he suspend the next annual grant.

MR. HAYES FISHER (Fulham) (for the LORD ADVOCATE): In answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question, I have to state that no official notification of the teacher's dismissal has been received, but the Department has to-day received a letter from the teacher stating that she has received notice of dismissal. In regard to the second paragraph, the Department has received satisfactory testimonials about the teacher from the managers, and a good report from the inspector. As to the third paragraph, the effect of a dismissal in regard to pension can only be regulated by the provisions of the Superannuation Act, and that Act gives the Department no power to interfere in the manner suggested.

STRANGFORD LOUGH LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware of the refusal of the Irish Lights Commission to comply with the request of the inhabitants in and the traders within the district of Strangford Lough to provide a light or beacon in the lighthouse which has been erected more than half a century, and if any and what steps can be taken to compel the Irish Lights Commissioners to provide this light; and will he recommend an application to the Board of Trade for further consideration of the application, in view of the present destruction of the lighthouse at Donaghadee.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): Since this question was placed on the Paper I have been in communication on the subject with my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade, and am informed by him that the lighthouse on Rock Angus, Strangford Lough, was erected before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and before the present mode of managing lighthouses came into existence. At that time the Irish Lighthouse Board paid for local lights out of the dues on the passing trade (a practice much complained of), and this practice was discontinued by the Merchant Shipping Acts of 1853 and 1854. The lighting of the beacon on Angus Rock would, I am informed, only prove a benefit to the local trade frequenting the Lough, and if carried out should not be done at the expense of the General Lighthouse Fund. With respect to the destruction of the Donaghadee lighthouse, it may be stated that a light of the same character as that shown from the lighthouse previous to its destruction has been exhibited since the night following the casualty.

IRISH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION PROGRAMME.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain why the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act programme, which is usually issued before Easter in each year, has not yet been issued for 1901, and is nearly three months overdue; whether he is aware of the inconvenience of this delay to, and the probable loss it will entail on, educational establishments at the next examinations, because the usual information as to the course of studies has not been published; and whether he can say when this programme will be published, and what it is proposed to do to insure the various educational establishments concerned against monetary loss, because of the delay in publishing the programme.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It has already been stated by me that when the programme for 1901 was under consideration in December last the Board of Intermediate Education determined to defer its final settlement until Parliament had considered the proposed legislation. At a meeting of the Board held on the 31st ultimo it was decided to submit to the Lord Lieutenant the rules and programme for 1901 without further delay, and on the same lines as in previous years. The rules and programme have since been approved by the Lord Lieutenant, and will very shortly be published. No material change having been introduced by the rules and programme for next year, the inconvenience or loss referred to in the question cannot arise.

THE COMPANIES BILL.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Companies Bill embodies the Amendments said by the Government to be required in the laws which govern limited liability companies which were placed first in the Government programme at the beginning of the session; and whether, seeing that similar Bills have been introduced every session by the Government for several years past in the House of Lords, it is his intention to proceed with the Bill in the present session; and, if so, whether he can now say when the Second Reading will be taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot name any day at present for the Second Reading of this Bill.

ORDER OF SUPPLY.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is in a position to fix a day for the discussion of any one of the principal Votes in Supply, such as that for the Home Office, that for the Foreign Office, or that for Shipbuilding.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it will be expedient to leave my reply to this question till Monday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have to put to the First Lord of the Treasury the usual question as to the business of the House for next week.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On Monday I propose to take, as is usual at this time of the year, a motion for the time of the House, except Wednesday, the 20th inst., and Wednesday, the 27th inst., which will be reserved, according to usage, for the later stages of Private Bills which have already passed the Second Reading stage. After that has been disposed of I propose to take the Committee stage of the Australian Commonwealth Bill, and the three subsequent Orders will be the Railways (Prevention of Accidents) Bill, the Land Charges Bill, and the Burial Grounds Bill. On Tuesday I shall ask the House to consider Army Estimates in Supply, in order to provide funds necessary for carrying on the war in South Africa. On Thursday I propose to take the Ecclesiastical Assessments (Scotland) Bill first. Information as to subsequent Orders I will give on a later day.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): Are all the outstanding Army Votes to be brought on on Tuesday, or will some be deferred to enable a later discussion on the Army Estimates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Army Votes which will be taken first on Tuesday are Nos. 6 and 7. In no case do I propose to take the whole of the Army Votes, because that would remove from the House the possibility of discussing questions of military policy in Supply before the end of the session, which I think would be an inconvenient course.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: Are we to understand that there will be a Supplementary Estimate presented on Tuesday?

MR. WYNDHAM: As far as I know there is no probability of our requiring an additional Estimate for the war.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I meant to convey was that it was the war in South Africa that rendered it necessary for us to get money at once.

MR. D. A. THOMAS: Will the right hon. Gentleman reconsider his decision with regard to taking private Members' time, so as to except Tuesday week, when I have down a resolution regarding our national coal supply?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): And there is also one affecting the Incorporated Law Society. Do the Government propose to take the Savings Banks Bill to-night?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not to-night.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): Will any business except Supply be taken on the allotted days?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No Government business other than Supply is taken on allotted days.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): What Votes in Supply will be taken to-morrow? Will the right hon. Gentleman postpone those referring to the Woods and Forests Office and the Public Record Office, in which some Welsh Members are interested?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: After the Education Estimates are disposed of we shall proceed with Class 2. I shall be

POST OFFICE SITES [EXPENSES].

Committee to consider of authorising the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of all sums payable by the Postmaster General under any Act of the present session to enable Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire lands for the public service, and of all expenses incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of such Act (Queen's Recommendation signified), To-morrow.—(Mr. Ritchie.)

PUBLIC LIBRARIES BILL [Lords].

RAILWAYS (PREVENTION OF ACCIDENTS) BILL.

(In the Committee.)

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1900-1.

CLASS IV.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,585,099, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Board of Education, and of the various Establishments connected therewith, including sundry Grants-in-aid."

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): Attempts have been made in some quarters during recent years to introduce into the discussion on such occasions as this questions of a trivial and personal character; but the attention of Parliament has not been thereby diverted from the serious and important facts which it has been my duty to lay before them. The facts have been considered and discussed by Parliament, by local bodies, by the public press, and remedies for the evils laid before Parliament have been suggested, and, in some cases, have been carried into execution. I think that on this occasion I can best occupy the time of the House by pointing out the conditions that will have to be fulfilled if the great reforms embodied in the Code of the present year, by which a single block grant is to be substituted for the separate payments which are made for various subjects of instruction, is to have practical effect. It is a great mistake to speak of that measure, the measure in the Code, as if it were an accomplished reform. It is rather of a negative than of a positive character. The provisions of the Code will remove the obstacles which prevent the establishment of a better system of instruction, but of themselves they do not accomplish that result. Progress is now possible, but the effect of the provisions of the Code is rather to permit it and not to ensure it. Now, in the first place, the policy of Her Majesty's Government must be seconded by the managers of schools. That has not always hitherto been the case. Her Majesty's Government having abandoned the system of individual examination, many school boards and many of the Voluntary associations have rushed into the breach and have of their own accord established a system of individual examination. Bishop Butler says, "Of education information is really the least part"; but these authorities act as if information was the whole object of education, and they employ the teachers in cramming into the children a number of facts which are afterwards disgorged by the diocesan or the School Board inspector in the shape of personal examination. Her Majesty's Government believe that a system of that kind is extremely detrimental to education, and I should like to read to the Committee the observations made by one of our inspectors. This applies to Voluntary schools, but the same thing applies to the case of the Board schools. The inspector says—

"A portion of each school's aid has been in some instances allotted to the payment of an 'organising visitor,' whose visits are quite unnecessary and not always wished for by the managers or teachers. Such visits, which, I am told, frequently result in individual examination of the old and worst type, cannot, except in the case of a bad school, do any good, and very frequently do much harm, tending as they do to throw the progressive teachers back into the old and evil path of cramming for results."

But to carry out the policy of the Government it is not only necessary that the managers of schools should be willing to co-operate, but also that the co-operation should be active and intelligent. I am sorry to say that that also has not always been the case. In the beginning of this year a deputation of rural school teachers came to see me—they were quite leading men of their class—and with them I had a most interesting and most instructive conversation about the possibilities of better teaching for rural schools. The other day I received from one of these teachers a letter in which the writer said—

"I proposed a few days ago to take my scholars through the fields to notice the blossoms of timber and fruit trees. I had a note from my manager to the effect that there is very little educational benefit to be obtained by taking children into fields. The farmers and labourers laugh at the proposal."

It is obvious from this that this teacher's efforts to secure a better kind of teaching for the children were nipped in the bud. I should like to call attention to how very differently these things are done in America. I quote from Mr. Salmon, of the Swansea Training College, who recently visited America—

"There is much out-door work everywhere I happened to reach Chicago during the first days of spring, and half the class-rooms of one school which I visited were empty in consequence of the children being gardening or watching the budding trees. In Central Park, New York, I saw several groups in charge of their teachers, and the sight was obviously common, for I was almost the only one who turned to look at it."

But not only is it necessary that we should have active managers; something must be done also to improve the supply of teachers. Now the mainstay of the supply of teachers is our pupil teachers' system. That system is unique. It is only in this country, in Great Britain and Ireland alone, that such a system for the supply of teachers exists. Of course, the system is so prevalent and so extensive in this country that it is impossible to change it, certainly hastily. The only thing to be done is to improve the system. But when you try to improve the system it is not only the Government but the managers of the schools themselves that are on the horns of a dilemma. If you leave things as they are, children in the rural schools can hardly ever attain to the training college, and will never become leading members of the profession of teaching, except in those few isolated cases where children of ability and energy force their way through all the obstacles that have to be encountered. As far as I know, only one or two reforms have been effected in the position of pupil teachers, since I became Vice-President of the Council. One was to slightly raise the age at which children are admitted pupil teachers up to the still very early age of fifteen; and another is the restriction of the hours during which they might be employed in the schools to twenty hours a week. Just think what that means! It means all the secular time during which the school is opened; and a child who has to work in school for twenty hours a week has only the rest of its time to carry on its education and to develop those faculties which are necessary in a teacher of the young. A further attempt was made last year to impel those interested in the employment of pupil teachers to ensure their being properly educated. But if this sort of reforms are initiated by the Education Department, or by the managers of the schools, or are carried into effect, they will destroy the pupil-teacher system in rural schools. One of the school inspectors says—

“The naked and lamentable fact is that the regulations of the Department—the wise and humane regulations—which limit the hours of work for pupil teachers, are leading to their disappearance from the Voluntary schools. Under the School Board, which had for a long time acted upon the half-time system, and which does not reckon pupil teachers as necessary upon the effective staff, these regulations have, of course, fallen short of the previous practice. But in Voluntary schools which are staffed down to a minimum, or but slightly above it, and where consequently pupil teachers are in charge of classes, it is obviously to the immediate interest of managers and head teachers—in the daily working of their time-table—to make arrangements which will avoid the dislocation caused by the pupil teachers leaving the school for their work at central classes. And thus it comes that the pupil-teacher system seems likely to wither away among the Voluntary schools here. Managers find it difficult to obtain them, and the head teachers don't want them, and there is a substitute at hand. I fancy that my lament will be echoed in any district in England. The teacher under Article 68 is rapidly becoming mistress of the situation.”

Sir J. Gorst.

The pupil teachers under the most favourable circumstances are taught: they are not educated to teach: they are simply prepared for examination. I should be glad to send to any Member who cares to see it a set of pupil-teachers' examination papers. He will see how ridiculous is the information which these children are expected to acquire; and, secondly, how ignorant they are on all the subjects on which they are taught. I think the papers will show how it is almost impossible under the present system that you can have a supply of teachers educated and trained who are fit to carry out the improved system which the institution of the block grant renders possible. I have often told the House that the rural pupil teachers who have not the advantage of central classes are not, and cannot be, so well crammed as the town pupil teachers, who find their way to the training colleges. I have here statistics which prove the truth of that. I find that in the last Queen's scholarship examinations, of the men, in the first class only 4 per cent. and in the second class only 8·2 per cent. had served their time in rural schools; and of the women, in the first class, out of 2,070 candidates, only 74, or 3·8 per cent., and of the second class only 10·6 per cent. had been educated in rural schools, thus showing that in the training colleges, where the best of the teacher's education is finished, the rural pupil teacher is practically only conspicuous by his absence. Now, if Parliament really intend to have teachers properly trained and properly fitted for the work they have to do, they must pick the children out of the elementary or higher elementary schools when they are of a proper age; they must send them with scholarships to the secondary schools as they are trying to do in Wales, and they must have a sufficient supply of training colleges in which to train these young teachers as soon as they are fit to be trained. I now come to the question of the training colleges. At Christmas, 1899, 2,904 men presented themselves for examination. Of these 532 got into the first class, 897 into the second class, 1,126 into the third class, and 349 failed altogether. Of the women who presented themselves for examination, 2,070 got into the first class, 3,992 into the second class, and 2,583 into the third class; 1,644 failed altogether. But of those who succeeded in the examinations a great many teachers failed to get into the training colleges for want of room. I find that of the men who showed a desire to obtain admission to training colleges—2,838 in number—only 1,042 got in; 223 failed not because of failure in their examination, but because of lack of accommodation, and the remainder failed because of their insufficient educational standard. The case of the women is far worse. Of the 3,968 who desired to get into training colleges, 1,575 got in, and 1,369, though qualified, failed to get in through lack of accommodation. Thus one half of them were unable to get the training they desired for themselves. Every training college in the country is absolutely full. There are two sorts of training colleges—residential and day training colleges. There is a good deal of difference of opinion whether the training in the residential college or the training in the day college is, on the whole, the most advantageous. The objections which are taken against the residential college are that the students are shut up with persons of the same age and the same education, having in view the same profession in life, that the tendency of the system is to narrow their perception, and that they fail to get that liberal education which is so desirable. The objection to the day training college is that the students are not sufficiently under observation, and that it is on moral grounds, on grounds of character, undesirable to leave them so much to themselves. Neither of these objections necessarily applies to either the one kind of college or the other. There is a residential college at Cheltenham where the young ladies who go to be trained are mixed up with the girls of the rest of the school. They are not distinguished from them in any way, and they have the advantage of belonging to a very fine high school, in which there is a very good tone, and which is in every way a desirable place for the education of young women. They do not get that narrowing of opinion which they might get in a place where they were all shut up together. Nor is the objection to the day training college at all necessary. At both Cambridge and Oxford the young men who are in the day training colleges there are generally members of colleges, where they have the advantage of association with their college companions and where they are under the college discipline. Those who are not members of colleges (and they are comparatively few) are under the Board of Studies of Oxford and Cambridge, which looks after the non-collegiate students. I was once taken to a hostel at Cardiff where there were a number of young women belonging to the day training college who were boarded and lodged with young ladies who were studying in the college and were in no respect distinguished from their companions, who were going into other professions and had other views in life, and, no doubt, they were as well taken care of as the students in the best training college in England. One would think that in these circumstances the Government had better leave the matter free, and had better leave students to adopt whichever kind of training they themselves or their friends or parents think to be for the best. But for some reason or other the State now pays, and has always paid, more for a teacher being trained in a residential college than in a day training college, and as it is the day training college which is most easily expanded, and which can be most easily made to accommodate more students, I think a very easy reform would be to even the thing all round—that the State should give a definite sum for the training of a teacher, and leave it to the young teacher and his friends to decide in what particular establishment he should prepare himself. The real fact is that there is no such thing as a Queen's "scholarship." It is not a scholarship in the ordinary sense in which a county, or college, or university scholarship is a scholarship. It is an undertaking on the part of the State to pay a sum of money to the institution in which the young person is trained, and I believe that if an arrangement were made by which the whole thing was levelled all round, you might establish two classes of scholarship. I do not know that it is so much to the interest of the State to train a young person who has taken only a second class as one who has taken a first class. It is just and right that the first class should have the larger scholarship, and if the second class students choose to go on in the profession, their friends should find something towards their maintenance in the training school. Anyhow, I am quite certain that the only way in which you can make a large and immediate extension of training college accommodation is by putting the day training students on the same footing as the residential students, and inviting the University Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge and other institutions for the education of young people to extend their day training college accommodation and so increase the number of places. But you not only want more places in your colleges; you want a greater elasticity in the curriculum of the colleges themselves. I cannot understand why teachers should all be educated and trained upon one single model. You do not do it in your university. There one man goes in for literary studies, another man for science, and another man for mathematics, and if you are going to have rural teachers to carry out any of those schemes which have been discussed during the last few months in the press, of teaching children more by observation and by a kind of elementary science than by mere reading, writing, and grammar, you no doubt require a special kind of training. At present the efforts of the trained teacher in the rural schools are not always very successful. The rural schools are chiefly staffed by town-bred teachers, who, having passed a less favourable examination, are obliged to take a rural school as a kind of pis aller. They generally go there passing the time until they can do something better for themselves. One of the inspectors told me he heard, in a large infant Board school, the head-mistress, giving a lesson on the rabbit, tell her class that another name for the rabbit was the hare. And at another Board school in the same place the same inspector heard a teacher inform her class that cows' horns were made of ivory, and she wrote ivory with great complacency on the blackboard. But without these extravagant instances, this is the kind of way in which the teaching is too often done by the present trained teacher. This is the sort of way in which agriculture and horticulture have been taught.

"The scholars," says the inspector, "read books in class on agriculture and horticulture for half an hour. They then copy a portion of the lesson in exercise books or the teacher dictates a summary of it, and this is called science! Nothing is done to cultivate the power of observation, and there are no experiments."

Some persons have said that you want to have an inferior class of teachers for rural schools. No, you do not want an inferior class of teachers, but you want a class of teachers who are trained to teach in rather a different manner from that in which town children are taught. A country child cannot receive abstract knowledge as easily as the town child does. First, the children want their powers of observation, which are generally very good, developed and brought out. They want to learn how to find out facts for themselves, and, finally, they want, what they can easily do in the country, to apply their knowledge to some particular and concrete purpose. There are three types of teacher we can conceive of. There is, first of all, the present teacher, who, in his place and with the kind of children to whom his teaching is suitable, is extremely good; then there is the rural teacher, who teaches by observation and experiment; and, finally, there is the kindergarten teacher, who is to teach the very young; and I cannot see why an arrangement should not be made by which all these kinds of teachers should be produced for our children and be properly trained in proper institutions so as to be able to carry out the instruction which is best. Now I come to the children. There is no use having a block system unless your children are able to come to school under circumstances in which they can benefit by the teaching. First of all there are the infants' schools. I think the very name of infants' school is an absurdity. Infants ought not to be at school, but at play. In our country we begin our attempts at education a great deal too soon, just as we leave off a great deal too soon. I met at Whitsuntide in the Tyrol a fine young fellow who told me with great pride that he was six years of age and had never been inside a school, but that he was going this autumn after the long summer holidays were over, and then he would remain at school, really attending school, going there every day, and staying the whole time until he was fourteen years of age. I could not help contrasting the lot of that little fellow with the lot of the ordinary English country boy. He is cooped up in school as soon as he is three years old, when he had much better be playing about in the lanes or fields. He has a quantity of information crammed into him which his little brain is quite incapable of assimilating—often by the assistance of the cane—and he is taken out of school at eleven or twelve years to

Well, another great objection to these infants' schools is that there are so many older children in them. I think the Committee will, perhaps, agree with me that eight is a very liberal superior age for a school infant. Out of two million infants in our schools there were 3,543 under three years of age, and there were no less than 320,923 who were over seven years of age. I have got a list of the schools in which there are children over eight. In one school in Cheshire, which heads my list, there were no less than 31·8 of the infants over eight years of age. There are no less than sixteen schools which have over 20 per cent. of infants over eight, and it is the presence of these infants over eight which renders absolutely necessary that severe discipline which has been referred to.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): Are all these schools in the same district?

SIR J. GORST: Oh no, they are not in the same district. They are scattered all over England. Passing from the infant schools, I think the whole Committee will agree with what I said—and as to which I was asked so much last year—that the State having provided free education, school buildings, and teachers, the least we can expect from the parents is that they will send their children to school in a fit state to receive the instruction which the State has provided, and the children ought not to be sent to school to receive instruction in an unfit state, either through hunger or through fatigue caused by undue labour out of school hours. As regards the feeding of children it is the general opinion that this is a matter which should be left altogether to private charity, and that the school authorities should not deal with it. I got into a great scrape last year by enumerating some opinions that it was the duty of the school authorities to see that the children were fed before they were taught. I am quite willing to agree that children should be fed by charitable agencies if they can be, but it seems to me that if you compel children to go to school and compel them to receive instruction, then you have the obligation thrown upon you to make some provision by which those children shall be sent to school in a fit state. This is not a private duty thrown on the parent, it is a public duty which the State has a right to insist on being fulfilled; and, if proper laws are made and a proper administration of the law carried into effect, I believe the cases in which children would be sent to school unfed and unfitted to receive instruction would be extremely rare. One or two examples made of negligent parents would prevent the recurrence of the offence. It is not the poor parent—it is very seldom extreme poverty which causes the trouble as to underfed children. It is generally idleness, or drunkenness, or carelessness on the part of the parents which is at the bottom of the mischief, or it is greediness for the small earnings of the children. It is not, I say, the poor, but the negligent parent, who is the real offender. I believe that posterity will view with surprise and wonder the state of affairs in this matter, and will marvel how this generation was so stupid as to tolerate it. I must observe that our official statistics are vitiated by the fact that we include in the average attendances children between three and five. I hope that in future will be avoided, as the average attendance can be arrived at by comparing the attendance of children above five years of age on the book of the school. As to children between three and five, not only are the parents at liberty to send them or not as they choose, but I venture to say that the best parents will not send their children before the school age. A good mother will not allow her tender child to go to school before five. Another matter to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee is how the percentage of attendances is arrived at. It is arrived at by taking the average attendance through the year and comparing it with the number on the books on a particular day, very often the last day of the year. That must obviously lead to very erroneous results, because, from some cause, there might be such shifting of the population as would give misleading results as to attendance. There would be a bad attendance made. On the other hand, if a large number of immigrants came into a parish at the end of the year and the children attended the school, that would show a very good attendance; but I have no doubt that the errors in this respect probably answer one another. Everybody knows why the attendance is so varied. In the first place, the maximum fine is so small for neglect; and I will place before the Committee two examples of how the present law works out. They are mentioned by one of the inspectors in his report. He says—

“I mention the following case as typical, not exceptional. A certain family are supposed to attend Paddington St. Mary Magdalene's School. There are three girls and one boy. Since July, 1897, the parents have been fined 5s. for each girl, and in their case the fine has been effective. For the son they have been summoned five times, but, as the fine is only 5s. and John earns 10s. a week helping a coster, he and his parents agree that

Here is another case in another inspector's report in London. He says—

“The parent has been summoned, convicted, and actually fined, and (which is not always the case) made to pay the fine, which amounted to 3s. 6d., for continued gross neglect of the attendance law. ‘And how,’ I asked the teacher, ‘is the child doing now?’ ‘Oh,’ she said, ‘she has only begun to attend this week, for she was not allowed by her parents to come last week. They kept her at work because, as they said, she had first to earn the amount of the fine.’”

Well, here is another case showing how it is sought to support the law—

“During the last four months a colleague and myself have been the attendance committee of the Board. We investigated 317 cases of irregularity, 4,580 visits were made by the attendance officer, and after repeated adjournments for improvement we brought four cases before the magistrates. No. 1, no attendance out of 68; No. 2, no attendance out of 68; No. 3, 22 attendances out of 35; No. 4, 27 attendances out of 35. All the cases were adjourned, attendance orders being made, and the School Board had to pay 8s. a case for the luxury of bringing the defaulters before the magistrate.”

It is evident that with the law as it stands a very much better attendance could be secured. There were cases in 1887 where the attendance was 76 per cent.; it is now 92 per cent., and I believe it has never been less since 1893, entirely owing to the energy of the attendance officer. The other day a deputation from the National League of Teachers waited on my noble friend the President of the Council, and immediately after that deputation, quite unsought for by me, I received from the manager of a rural school in Cambridgeshire a letter, in which he stated that he had requested the schoolmaster to work out the total of the attendances at that school. Everything was against them to start with; the mothers went out to work at a steam laundry or a jam factory. Yet with great patience the efforts made had yielded good results. The number on the roll on the previous year gave an average attendance of 98, 96, and 98, and so on. There is a reluctance on the part of the authorities to be severe, and a great deal is expected from patience and persuasion. The percentages are 98, 97, 99, and 98. They may occasionally be smaller in consequence of whooping-cough, heavy snows, feasts in surrounding villages, or scarlet fever, but there are only three weeks in the whole year in which the attendance is less than 97 per cent. That shows what a schoolmaster backed up by a good manager can do even under the present law. At Askrigg, a village in Wensley Dale, where some children have long distances to travel, an energetic master was very successful in getting good attendance. On the occasion of a local sheep-washing the vicar met a boy going to school, and asked him how it was. "Why, sir," the youth replied, "if I went to t' sheep-washing t' master would go clean off his head." Now as to inspectors. This new system will give an inspector no increase of his direct power. He still will act entirely under the orders of the Education Department, and any action of his can be appealed against; but it will give him enormously increased influence and responsibility. In the first place it will be his duty to give advice to teachers and managers of schools as to what they can do, and as to what it is expedient for them to do; and he will be particularly qualified to give this advice because, going all over the schools of the neighbourhood, he has the opportunity of seeing good work in one place which may be imitated in another. I have a remarkable case here. There has been a good deal of talk recently about school gardens; and this is a letter to the county council of Essex from a schoolmaster in Essex—

"My gardening class was first established in 1895, so it has been in operation five years. The garden is about one rood in extent, and is worked as a whole, not in single plots, by the class. The class varies in number, according to the number of eligible boys, as they must be in Standard IV. and upwards. The average number, however, is fourteen or fifteen, which is as many as one man can successfully superintend. The crops grown are those of an ordinary kitchen garden, and such as would be grown in the lads' gardens at home. About half the total area is given over to fruit cultivation, gooseberries, currants, raspberries, and strawberries. Apple culture is taught from my own fruit borders. Flower culture is not neglected, as the boys plant and prune roses, plant bedding plants, etc., and keep the lawn and edges trim. In fact, most of the work in a good general garden (except greenhouse and hothouse work) is done here by the lads. My aim is not so much to turn out 'horticulturists' as to make the lads take an interest in their own gardens at home, and to work these on proper principles. We take elementary botany as a class subject, and the scientific lessons therein learnt are illustrated as much as possible in the plant life of the garden. I may say that there is no lesson that the boys enjoy more than their Friday afternoon gardening lesson, and it has materially helped to improve the attendance on Friday. When I mention that in our local show last year (embracing four parishes) we exhibited in the amateurs' and open classes ten exhibits, and the prize record was nine firsts and one second, you may judge that our school garden is not to be despised in the local competition. I am sorry I have no lad eligible to apply for a horticultural scholarship. There is such a dearth of country houses in this immediate neighbourhood that very few boys go in for gardening as an occupation."

The inspector, spreading about his district the example of an undertaking of this kind, can do enormous good. There are many who might not have the ability to invent such a scheme, but they can imitate it. Then the duty of an inspector will be occasionally to put his veto on proposals of managers and teachers. But that veto will be rarely exercised. It is seldom that the inspectors discourage even an experiment in the schools; and if any inspector were to veto any plan which he ought not to veto there is always the Education Department to appeal to. Therefore I do not think that the interference of inspectors is very much to be feared, while their advice and counsel will be of immense advantage to schoolmasters and managers. To perform duties of that kind we ought to have a most excellent staff of inspectors. The present staff of inspectors was organised under a different system in the days of payment by results, and consisted of inspectors who looked after the schools, and of sub-inspectors who did the rough work of individual examination, and saved the inspectors a certain amount of fatigue in work of that kind. Now, all inspectors have the same functions, and might be better divided into seniors and juniors. An inspector ought to be a man of very liberal education, to have his mind and faculties very well developed, and to have considerable knowledge of the history of education, not only in this country, but in other countries; and he ought to have some experience himself of teaching. But, above all, you want an inspector of character—an inspector who has sufficient independence to dare to tell the truth, because all central authorities like to reward people who prophesy smooth things. Since the time of the prophet who announced to Ahab impending death, disagreeable truths have always been punished with affliction rather than welcomed with reward. Inspectors should be appointed for life. I have received a letter from the Secretary of the Cambridge Appointments Association, in which he says—

"We have several applications from men who wish to be sub-inspectors of schools. They know that they could not possibly get an appointment as inspector, and therefore they fall back upon the lower-paid appointment. But as far as I can see there is no entry for them unless they will risk a long period of training. One who wishes for such a berth is a Trinity man who took a first in classics, knows a good deal of French and German, and would do his work conscientiously. But I suppose it would be rash to advise such a man to go to a training college on the chance of being afterwards appointed."

That shows that there is ample material among the growing youth out of which inspectors can be chosen. As to women inspectors, if the Committee will recollect how large a proportion of the children in the schools consists of infants and girls they will see that women inspectors are a very desirable addition to our staff. An experiment was made in the appointment of some a few years ago, and that experiment has been very successful. At present they are all of the lowest rank—the second class of the sub-inspectors; but even for such positions there are now upon the books of the Education Department a very large number of applications from very highly trained women, who have taken high degrees at Oxford and Cambridge, who have had teaching experience, and who have an enormous amount of zeal for and desire to promote the interests of education. That will show the committee that, as far as inspectors are concerned, men and women, we have ample material on which to draw for the very best kind of inspectors; and that now that the Department will have to depend so much upon its inspectors for the efficiency of its schools there is no danger of the system breaking down. I am very much obliged to the Committee for listening to this long explanation. I wanted to show that we must not rest with the idea that the reform of the present Code is accomplished, but that it only gives the opportunity of really improving our schools. I have sketched out some of the conditions which will have to be fulfilled, some of the difficulties which will have to be faced, and some of the things which will have to be accomplished before the expectations which have been excited by the new departure can be really satisfied as to improvement in the elementary education of the country.

Sir J. Gorst.

*MR. WILLIAM JONES (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): After hearing his interesting exposition of the principles of the Education Code, one regrets that the right hon. Gentleman was not the responsible Minister for Education during the last four years, for if we had had him, a keen lover of education, who knows the principles of education, not merely to give us this exposition, but to translate it into schemes of practical advantage to the country, it would have been a great boon and a commanding benefit to all classes. But what has he done really? He has given us admirable suggestions, but he has practically pointed out no single real remedy. He has given us grievances, he has desired to do away with them, and he has applied sticking plaster to the arm of a man suffering from heart disease. I thoroughly sympathise with almost everything he has said, but at the same time he has been addressing a letter to posterity in the vague hope that that letter some day or other may reach its destination. He has told us the shortcomings of rural schools and infant schools. He has pointed out what were the reforms needed for teachers. I believe we are all in agreement with his suggestions. Already educationists have pointed out these grievances and the means by which they may be remedied. Take, for instance, the question of rural schools. The right hon. Gentleman has said, and said rightly, that it is a matter of impossibility to fill the rural schools with efficient teachers. Why? One reason is that in spite of an aid-grant amounting to three-quarters of a million, and in spite of another grant on the block principle in the new Code, most of which will go to Voluntary and rural schools, there is no provision in the Code or in any other scheme proposed by the right hon. Gentleman to enable these schools to be filled with admirably equipped teachers. During the Whitsuntide holidays I have visited several rural schools, some of them being Church schools and some Voluntary schools of other kinds, and the teachers have told me that they are obliged to keep their schools filled with apprentices and with that wonderful factor in our educational system, namely, "Article 68." Why is this? Because the teachers themselves have no power to select their own assistants. In one Church school the headmaster told me that he was invariably handicapped, and when I asked whether he could not select the most brilliant boy or girl to become his assistant, he replied that not merely could he not get his assistants from the majority of the children, but he could never get them at all, as the power of selection rested with the manager. I say that the teachers themselves who have trained the children and who know their mental power and teaching capacity, are the people who should select the assistants. Then the right hon. Gentleman has submitted another proposition with regard to these rural schools. He says the teachers ought to come from urban schools or from places where the teachers can be trained. Why cannot the managers of these Voluntary schools, who are receiving so much grant, see that these teachers are properly trained and efficiently equipped for their work. The Archbishop of Canterbury said yesterday that the subscriptions this year in connection with Church schools had sunk below the figure at which they stood in 1897. Surely with this aid-grant and the grant on the block principle the managers of these schools ought to furnish what I consider to be the most important factor—a really good teacher, one who has been properly endowed as regards education, both as to scholarship and as to technical training. But we do not get such teachers. A few years ago a committee of experts sat to inquire into the pupil teacher system. The chairman of that committee, was a clergyman of the Church of England, the Senior Inspector of Schools. All the members of that committee were agreed that this system of getting teachers on the cheap child-labour principle was a vicious one, and ought to be remedied by the pupil teachers and apprentices being sent to secondary schools or to pupil-teacher centres, and prohibited from teaching until they were better trained and more intellectually equipped. Our rural schools are simply filled with little boys and girls and “Article 68.” It was reported to me the other day that in the Oxford Diocese about 40 per cent. of the pupil teachers belonged to “Article 68.” That is a shameful state of affairs, because, after all, “Article 68” in the majority of cases means a female who can show a certificate of good health or a certificate that she has been properly vaccinated, and may be without any teaching diploma whatsoever. Such a system would not be tolerated in Switzerland, Germany, France, and America, in fact, in any other civilised country except our own. The right hon. Gentleman has said that in Wales we are doing something with our pupil teachers. In my constituency, and in the neighbouring division, some of the school boards have established a system of sending intending pupil teachers to our county schools, where they study for two or three years before they begin to teach. There is no sense in putting boys or girls 14 or 15 years of age to teach classes of forty or fifty children. This is not a sectarian question at all. It is simply a question of educating more manly men and more womanly women. But until you train your teachers and give them all the powers possible through education in centres and secondary schools where they can mix with children drawn from all classes, you will not get the sort of teachers who can bring humanizing methods to bear on their pupils. Then there is the question of giving money for the training of these teachers. I would vote for an even better grant than the aid grant and the block system grant. I would support the State spending a million of money in educating our teachers. After all, what would a million of money be, spent in that way, when we can spend forty or fifty millions on war? One million, if properly administered, would be ample to train our juvenile apprentices by having them sent to secondary schools. I hope the right hon. Gentleman before he leaves his office will be able to do something in this direction. We all know what a fine educationist he is, but whenever he has attempted to put his desires into practical shape he has been handicapped and crippled. He is very much like another great educationist in this country who tried to preach the same gospel—a man who was, perhaps, one of the finest inspectors we ever had—namely, Mr. Matthew Arnold. The right hon. Gentleman's words breathed the spirit of Mr. Matthew Arnold; but like him he seems to be losing faith in his own ideals.

“Let them have it as they will;
We are tired: best be still.”

However, I hope in this Committee the right hon. Gentleman's plea will be sufficiently backed in his right endeavours, and not by educationists on one side of the House, as this question is altogether above sectarianism and party. Then there is the question of sending teachers to training colleges. The right hon. Gentleman says that existing training colleges are inadequate. I think the present equipment of training colleges can be reformed, and I will tell the Committee why. Most of the training colleges are denominational. Out of forty-three, thirty-five are purely denominational, and admission is generally conditioned upon connection with a particular church. Therefore, owing to the fact that our training colleges are left in the hands of denominational authorities, we are losing the best and most efficient teachers every year. We have excellent day training colleges. There are fourteen of them which are of vital importance, as being open to all. But we ought to give sufficient grants to keep the students either in a hostel or in a home. In day training colleges we pay for the training of females £30 a year—£10 for instruction and £20 for the hostel; while for males we pay £10 for instruction and £25 for maintenance. But in the denominational colleges we pay £50 a year. Why should there be that disparity? The grant for the day training colleges should be brought up to the level of that for the denominational colleges, and the denominational colleges should be freed from the provisions and regulations which debar the best Queen's scholars from entering them. In dealing with this question I desire also to suggest that we should combine in order to bring pressure to bear upon the Government. I know the present condition of things is not the fault of the right hon. Gentleman, or of the Board of Education. I know there are officials humane enough to adopt these schemes, and practical enough to carry them into effective force. What is wanted is that pressure should be brought to bear upon the Cabinet. As far as I can see, the only persons who at the present time exercise any influence are the Archbishop of Canterbury and some noble Churchmen. We ought to free our education from sectarian influences, and mould it in the highest interests of the State. There is nothing like education to raise the status of citizenship. Germany and Switzerland have seen this. In Switzerland they pay 2½d. per head of the population for the training of teachers, while we in a rich country like Britain pay scarcely a penny per head. Let us pay a sufficient grant to equip our schools with proper teachers, and so remedy the deplorable state of things now existing.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.) : I agree that the new Code introduced by the Government is the beginning of a new system of elementary education. I think we have now had a new light thrown upon the advantages of teaching country children under this system, and we can only express the earnest hope that the right hon. Gentleman will inspire the same intelligent spirit into all these institutions. If that is so we shall soon have a new era of teaching in our elementary schools. My principal object in rising is to call attention to a very remarkable and significant omission from the speech of my right hon. friend—I mean the entire absence of any statement as to higher education and what policy the new Board is likely to pursue. We spent some time last session discussing this question, and we certainly understood that something would be done without any more delay than was absolutely necessary, and that some time in the spring the new Board would come into active existence and take up seriously its duties as regards higher education. This is the only legitimate opportunity which this House is likely to have this session of discussing this question, and I wish to take advantage this afternoon of the opportunity afforded by this Estimate to ask some questions as to the position and the policy of the new Board as affecting higher as well as elementary education. I ventured to ask my right hon. friend a question the other day* as to the powers that would be transferred to the new Board, and as to the date when it would be fully constituted. I hope that to-night he will be able to give me a more satisfactory answer than he gave upon that occasion. He stated that before long—that was the indefinite expression he used—there would be a statement upon this subject made in another place. I venture to say that if he repeats that answer to-night this House will hardly take it as satisfactory. We were given to understand last year that from the time this Act came into force if we did not have here in this

*See The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxxiii., p. 736.

House a responsible Cabinet Minister as President of the Board of Education we should, at any rate, have the right hon. Gentleman, or someone who was in a position to speak with authority for the new Board, instead of having to deal with it as we have done before in a most unsatisfactory way. So far as we have seen at present, the new Act has had very little effect, and many of us cannot help thinking that the cause of education suffers very much from not having in this House of Commons a responsible Cabinet Minister representing the Education Department. We know that the right hon. Gentleman does everything he can in this direction, and we have to thank him for many improvements in many matters in connection with the new Code this year; but we should be very much more satisfied if he were authorised to speak with the authority which attaches to a Cabinet Minister in the position of President or responsible Vice-President of the new Board, and was able to tell us not only what the difficulties are, but also what is the general policy of the new Board for remedying these defects, and give us some assurance that those difficulties would be really remedied. It really comes to this, that in the present position of affairs the House of Commons has lost its control over the educational policy of the country. I do not think that ought to be the case when we have so recently passed a new Act. My right hon. friend will perhaps forgive me if I repeat this afternoon one or two questions which I put to him the other day. I hope he will be able to tell us before this debate ends why there has not yet been appointed any Assistant Secretary for Higher Education. Perhaps he will be able to tell us what line is to be drawn as regards the appointment of such an assistant secretary, and whether technical and secondary education are to be divided in the future. He may also be in a position to say whether the Government will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Departmental Committee which inquired so carefully into this question. We do not desire to insist upon every portion of that Report being laid upon the Table of the House, but I am sure many of us would like to know what the reasons are that lie at the bottom of the policy which is to be adopted by the new Board of Education, and how far the Departmental Committee recommended that powers should be transferred to the new Board from the existing Department. I think it is the more necessary because we have recently had laid upon the Table what is professedly the outcome of the Act of last session, namely, a draft Order in Council. I do not know how far I am in order in asking questions about the Order in Council as regards the transfer of certain powers of the Charity Commissioners, but I think I shall be in order in asking a few general questions. There are two clauses in that Order. The first clause relates to England and Wales at any rate, and, as far as I can understand, it merely transfers certain concurrent rights to inspect, which are the necessary concomitant of the Act of last year. Those powers are not taken away from the Charity Commissioners, but are left in their hands, and are given concurrently to the new Board. What I should like to know is this—will there be a concurrent inspector of secondary schools under the dual system, or will the new Board inspect education, leaving the Charity Commissioners to inspect the financial administration? We do not want any more inspections than are absolutely necessary, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman and the Government will see that there is no overlapping in this matter, and that there is no multiplication of inspecting authorities, because we have enough of them already. When we come to the other clause of the Order in Council we find that it is confined to Wales alone. Why, I would ask, is this transfer to take place for Wales and not for England? What good reason can the right hon. Gentleman give us why the Board of Education should not have similar powers as regards secondary schools in England as Wales possesses? I know only of one reason, and that is that there already exists an Intermediary Education Act in Wales, although it is nearly five years since the Commission reported upon the necessity of a similar Act for England. If that is the only reason I hope the right hon. Gentleman will assure us that a very short time will elapse before a similar Act is passed for this country. We have had very recently some light thrown upon this subject. We found the other day that in the view of the Government it was advisable that the powers now vested in the Charity Commissioners should be transferred to the Board of Education in respect of the City of Birmingham. I should like to know why this should not also apply to other parts. What is good for Birmingham should be good for other places. Is it not desirable that all these great educational endowments should be under the new Board of Education rather than half under one body and half under another? I hope the right hon. Gentleman will let us know in short what is to be the policy of the Government. Is the new Board to be the central authority for secondary education as well as for elementary education? If that is so, ought not the new Board to take over the powers of the Board of Agriculture in regard to education? As the right hon. Gentleman has pointed out, agriculture is a subject which has to be taught in elementary schools, but the Board of Agriculture has nothing whatever to do with the elementary schools or the secondary schools, speaking generally. They have nothing to do with the science schools where the principles of agriculture form part of the education. The only institutions in the country where the Board of Agriculture have any supervision, and where it is their duty to inspect, are those few institutions which are directly aided by Treasury grants, and administered by the Board of Agriculture. Surely, what we want is somebody that contains within itself a body of inspectors with agricultural knowledge and keenly interested in agricultural affairs, who shall keep an eye on every class of schools in the country where agriculture or anything bearing upon agriculture forms part of the system of education. We cannot expect the Treasury to authorise a double set of inspectors for agricultural education in this country. If this is the case, then surely the new Board ought to take over the educational inspection now exercised by the Board of Agriculture. I do not think that the Board of Agriculture should be divested of its powers for research. We have a very good precedent in the case of Scotland, where a few years ago the ordinary inspection exercised by the Board of Agriculture was given over to the new education department, the Board retaining its powers for research and experiment. That division is perfectly feasible; it has worked very smoothly in Scotland, and I hope the new Board will see its way to adopt it also. There is another subject which I hope the new Board will lose no time in dealing with, and that is the question of evening continuation schools. For a long time in country districts evening continuation schools have been growing it is true, but growing very slowly and spasmodically, and without any proper system of encouragement from the local authorities. If the right hon. Gentleman will consult the Return of evening continuation schools he will see that the number of these schools differs enormously in different counties, and I think he will agree with me that the great variety in the numbers which exists is largely due to the fact that in some counties these schools are encouraged and subsidised to a very large extent by the county authorities, whereas in other counties they are not subsidised at all. It may be invidious to mention names, but it can be clearly shown that evening continuation schools exist and flourish where they are aided not so much by the present inadequate Treasury grants, but where the Treasury grants are supplemented and completed by the county authorities. For that reason I venture to urge on the new Department the desirability of allowing county authorities, especially county authorities who are recognised under Clause 7, to undertake the supervision of these schools outside the large towns. In the large towns evening continuation schools are on the whole very well organised, but in small parishes they are not organised in the same manner, and it is in these cases that larger local areas are required for the organisation of our educational system. At present no county authority is under any statutory obligation to aid these continuation schools. I consider the county authorities should be under some obligation in the matter, and the best way of securing that is by allowing them to administer the Treasury grants for these schools in the same manner as is provided by Clause 7 for science and art schools. I suppose we shall have no further opportunity of discussing this question during the present session. We are promised in the remote and distant future—a future always receding—the introduction of another Secondary Education Bill, but it is clear we have now arrived at a stage of the session when many hon. Members may think more important subjects remain to be discussed, and when it is useless to expect that we shall see or hear anything of another Secondary Education Bill during the present year.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not entitled to discuss the prospects of future legislation.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I bow to your ruling, Sir. I sincerely hope my right hon. friend will be able to give us, before the debate closes, a further statement with regard to the constitution of the new Board, the policy of the new Board, and the view he takes of its functions as regards higher education generally. I cannot think that in calling attention to the higher branches of education I have exercised my opportunity of participating in this debate in any illegitimate manner. After all, elementary education, though extremely important, as lying at the root of our educational system, is amply discussed in many of its aspects year after year in this House. But we want in addition continuation schools and higher schools and thoroughly good technical instruction to complete the education of the children of this country, and until we have a properly organised Department I do not think the Committee will be satisfied with the general results achieved.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I desire to congratulate the Vice-President of the Council on the very interesting statement he has made this afternoon. He always gives the Committee something original, something different from what we expected, and he has acted on that principle to-day. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the various improvements he has been able to carry through during his tenure of office. I congratulate him on the block grant system and the abolition of the barbarous system of payment by results, which for a long time strangled the education of the country, and made the work of elementary teachers perfectly intolerable. At the same time I think that some additions will be required. I think, for instance, that the difference between 21s. and 22s. is hardly sufficient to be an adequate stimulus to teachers. However, I believe that we are now on the right road in adopting the principle of the systems of Germany and Switzerland. Formerly our educational system was one of verbal pedantry, and I congratulate the Committee on the steady advance we are making in an intelligent conception of what an educational system should be, and on the large extension of manual training which has taken place during late years, and the larger amount of discretion now given to managers as to the kind of education that ought to be given. I agree with what the Vice-President said as to the importance of rural children being trained in habits of observation. In America training in habits of observation is much greater than in this country. I had an opportunity of seeing something of the educational system of America. I went over the great training school in New York, the largest in the world, where 2,700 lady teachers go through a four years course in order to fit them for the work of teaching in the elementary schools. I found in one class that the subject of study was the leaves of trees, their form, structure, and uses. In another class the teachers were being taught the management of the Stock Exchange and how to handle stocks and shares. In that way education in America is admirably practical, and is carried on exactly on the lines described by the right hon. Gentleman this afternoon. Mr. Lowe once said that our educational system was the worship of inutility. That is so no longer, because I am glad to say that the Vice-President has a genuine enthusiasm for education. He has had the good fortune of seeing the resolution of the Berlin Conference, of which he was a member, carried into effect—namely, that the half-time age should be raised to twelve. I also congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the Bill passed by my hon. friend the Member for South Shields last session, to which he rendered valuable assistance—namely, that children in the agricultural districts should remain at school in winter time up to the age of thirteen. I also congratulate him on what, I think, is a very good departure—namely, the grafting of a system of higher education on our present elementary school system. That, I think, is eminently practical, and will provide exactly what is required by the children of what I may call the intelligent artisan classes. I think, however, the limit of age ought to be extended to sixteen or seventeen years. I also congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the great extension of evening continuation schools. That is a question in which I take a very deep interest. Many years ago I myself carried through the House unanimously a resolution in favour of establishing evening continuation schools. At that time the total attendance was only 30,000; now it is 435,000. That is a very gratifying increase, but we have still too many children leaving school altogether at twelve or thirteen, and forgetting nearly all they have learned. But there is no comparison even yet between our system of education and that of Germany. The technical schools of Germany are most wonderful institutions, and to prepare for them the children pass through a long period of continuation schools up to the age of sixteen or seventeen. I have made these remarks on the general question with a view to congratulating the Vice-President, but I desire now to make a few criticisms, not so much on the right hon. Gentleman personally as on the defects which spring out of our dual system of education. I will require to ask the indulgence of the Committee for a few minutes while I endeavour to show some of the results of the administration of the Education Acts of this country by the present Government, for I hold that under the administration of the present Government the defects of the dual system have been greatly aggravated. The fact is that clericalism in England is gradually producing similar results in this country as it has produced in France and most other Continental countries. Clericalism is now in control of a large portion of the education of this country. It is drawing its bands tighter and tighter, and it is coming more and more into collision with the convictions of the masses of the people, and often with the convictions of the teachers themselves. I am aware I cannot now discuss the foundations of our system of education, but I can discuss the question of administration. I allege that the law has been strained in favour of clerical pretensions. There is much more friction in the country now than there was a few years ago, and this friction has chiefly occurred among what I may call the Protestant and Nonconformist sections of the country. Two and a half millions of children are now being educated in clerical schools. I must make a protest against what I conceive to be an abuse of the Education Act—an abuse which, when that Act was passed by the Liberal Government in 1870, it was never intended should be tolerated. It has become a customary thing to march the children of Nonconformists, as well as other Protestant children, into church to attend what in some cases is called "the service of the Mass." I have had several cases brought before me in which the whole school is expected to march to Mass on saints' days, which are very numerous in some schools. Now, I hold that that is a colourable evasion of the law. I do not think it is according to law, although the Vice-President of the Council has repeatedly stated in this House that the Government or the Education Board has no right to interfere. I think that was not the view taken ten or twenty years ago, and I do not think it is the view that will be allowed to be taken ten or twenty years hence. I was challenged by the First Lord of the Treasury, on the day before the adjournment for the holidays, to give instances of such things. I gave one instance, although I had not prepared myself with all the detailed facts. But I have now a list of many cases, which, if necessary, I can give to the House, where children are marched to these services of the Mass. Out of a large number I select a few—

"ALL SAINTS', HARLES DEN.—Children taken every saint's day to Eucharist service, which is another name for the Mass.

"HASCOMBE VOLUNTARY SCHOOL. — Children sent to church every Tuesday in Lent.

"BERKHAMSTED, AND OTHER PLACES.—Children marched in procession to a service of a highly ritualistic character without the opportunity being given to the parents to object.

"ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S, BRIGHTON.—Two thousand children from the National schools marched once a week to hear Mass in a Church of England school.

DORCHESTER, OXFORDSHIRE.—The scholars marched to a High Church mission without the permission of the parents."

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): The hon. Member says "without the permission of the parents." Did the parents object?

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: The children were directed to go, and the parents were not asked whether they wished them to go or not.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon. Member how he makes the Board of Education responsible for these practices?

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I have already intimated my opinion that it is a misuse of the Education Act of 1870. I am quite aware that the Board of Education denies that it has any power in the matter. However, I will not press the subject, except to repeat that in my opinion it is an abuse of the Act of 1870, and that there should be sufficient protection for the children against such practices as these. It is alleged that the Conscience Clause protects children from compulsory attendance at these services. I am assured it is not so in practice. I am told that in many ways children are penalised for non-attendance, so that poor parents dare not forbid them. They often hold their houses on sufferance from large proprietors who are influenced by the vicar. I will give two or three specific cases in which the Conscience Clause has been abused—

"LONGBRIDGE DEVERILL, WILTS.—A man and his wife came to work for a local farmer, and attended the Primitive Methodist chapel. The children attended the Church of England school, the only one available. They claimed the Conscience Clause, to the astonishment of the teachers and managers. At the end of the school year the eldest boy obtained one of the vicar's prizes (which was a prayer book). On saints' days the school was closed, and the children were taken to church, but this boy was set to work to clean out the school water-closets, etc. This is the spirit shown in that village and in many others in Wiltshire to-day, where the priests are members of the E.C.U. and other such societies.

"DEVIZES, WILTS (The Rev. J. Day).—There are nine hundred Nonconformist Sunday school scholars in Devizes. Five hundred of them at least are compelled to attend Roman Catholic or Anglican day schools, mostly Anglican. Sacramentarian teaching, it is very well known, is directly given in the day schools here. Not long ago one of my Sunday scholars wanted to be a teacher in St. James's School. I missed him from my Sunday school, and when I inquired, the mother said that he was obliged to go to church.

"LUDLOW.—The rector is a High Churchman. Many children of Nonconformist parents attend his school. Saints' days are regularly observed, and on many of them the children are marched to the parish church. To-day, for instance, being Ascension Day, he has all the children taken to church. The district visitors do their best to induce the parents to send their children to the National school, and to my knowledge persuaded a woman close by my house to take her children from the British school, telling her that her children were being taught heretical doctrine.—(W. O. Robinson.)

"CAMELFORD, CORNWALL.—Church of England school here with 250 scholars; three-fourths of them are children of Nonconformists. A general holiday is given on Confirmation day, Ash Wednesdays, and other Church festivals, but a great fuss is made if a scholar stays away to attend a service at any of the Nonconformist places of worship. No child can become a pupil or enter the teaching profession without first becoming a communicant, and this has taken some from our churches and is a great cause of annoyance.—(Thomas E. Wakefield.)"

I will now give a still stronger case, the particulars of which were collected by Mr. Hirst Hollowell—

"I was written to by a small farmer in Elton, Derbyshire, not long ago, and he said that he had demanded the Conscience Clause at the Church of England school for his children, with the result that for several mornings they were kept shut in a small cloak-room for three-quarters of an hour in the suffocating air without education. At my request he demanded different treatment, and got it; but the fact that his children were treated in the way they were shows the spirit in which the Conscience Clause is often carried out. At Thrapston, Northamptonshire, a mother came to me and said she was a Baptist, but, having to send her child to the Church of England school, the only one in the town, she sent a request that her child should not be taught the Creed or Catechism. In spite of this both were taught to her, and one day the child, in school, said, 'Please, teacher, mother says I am not to be taught this.' Before the whole school the teacher answered, 'Oh, your mother does not believe in the Catechism, then. What does she believe? Does she believe in the devil?'"

The Rev. J. T. Horne, Crewe, writes on 17th January, 1900—

"Many Free Churchmen in the town are subject to the indignity of having their children marched to the Established Church for the purpose of being taught sacramentarian doctrines before the school work proper is commenced."

St. Barnabas, Crewe, is a church where this practice is carried on. In reply to a complaint, the Education Department said, in a letter dated 26th April, 1900—

"With regard to religious instruction I am to invite your attention to Section 7, Sub-Section 1 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870."

A question was put in the House of Commons by Mr. C. P. Trevelyan as to whether it was legal for school managers to march scholars to religious worship during school hours without first obtaining the permission of the parents. The reply was to the effect that—

"The practice of occasionally taking scholars to places of worship during the time set apart for religious instruction has never been objected to by the Committee of Council, and is in their opinion legal."

At any rate the country is getting to clearly understand how the law is being carried out. I wish to ask the Vice-President whether it is legal for the Anglican clergy who teach the Mass and the Confessional to remove teachers from their schools who refuse to teach such doctrines? I have letters from National School teachers telling me this is the case. One informs me that the vicar threatened to dismiss him unless he joined the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament. The insecurity of the tenure of Voluntary teachers makes them the slaves of the parish clergyman. Mr. Jackman, president of the National Union of Teachers, gives some deplorable cases of arbitrary eviction. He mentions that a mistress was dismissed because she would not attend "Early Communion"; a master was dismissed because he attended evangelical services in the neighbouring village; another because he refused to chant the psalms; another because he refused to sit in the choir, and another because he managed the village library. Surely it is time this tyranny should be put an end to. I am informed that there are 2,700 ritualistic clergy who have complete control of 2,700 Voluntary schools. Another grievous abuse is that by order of the Department considerable numbers of Protestant children are obliged to attend Roman Catholic schools owing to the absence of Board schools with free education. It is generally supposed that elementary education is now free, but this is a delusion in some places so far as Protestants are concerned. At Southport the parents of 1,200 children applied for free places, and on 19th November, 1896, the Department directed 300 of these children to find free places in St. Mary's Roman Catholic school and the Dean Cooke Roman Catholic Memorial School, and informed 300 more that they must wait until a new Church of England school was built in the Marshside district. Nearly all the children in question are of Protestant families, and most of them Nonconformists. Claims for 406 free places were sent in at Chorlton-cum-Hardy. At the request of the Education Department the school attendance officer of the district council made an investigation. Subsequently a notice was issued by the Department requiring 142 new free places. This notice expired on 20th January, 1900, but as yet nothing has been done. The Department in this case indicated that there were 158 free places in St. Augustine's Roman Catholic School, and it has reduced the claims from 406 to 142 partly on the ground that there are these places in the Roman Catholic school. The general policy seems to be that while there is any spare room in Roman Catholic schools there is no necessity to build schools for Protestant children.

SIR J. GORST: It is not the policy; it is the law.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: Well, it is entirely opposed to the feeling of the country. At Levenshulme all parents of children in and above Standard II., applying for free education, were informed that free places would be provided for their children at St. Mary's, Levenshulme. This is a Roman Catholic school. The parents were individually addressed by the Department, and Hilda Margaret Harrison was one of the children so directed to attend. At Clayton-le-Moors, near Accrington, six parents received letters from the Department directing them to send their children to St. Mary's Roman Catholic School. Amongst them were Mr. D. Bashall, Mr. J. H. Hacking, Mrs. S. A. Griffiths, and Mr. J. Aldritt, who objected to send their children to Roman Catholic schools. Thirty-two applications for free places were made at Rugby. The Education Department replied that there were free places at the Roman Catholic schools. It was rejoined that the parents were Protestants, but the Department again stated that the Roman Catholic schools contained the only places available. I assert that this is an intolerable abuse, and is done under the clerical pressure which is brought to bear on the Education Department. The High Anglicans much prefer that children should be sent to Roman Catholic schools than to Board schools, and I am informed that now under the School Board system of London considerable numbers of Protestant children are forced into Roman Catholic schools. I quote from a letter I received last year from a London Board School teacher—

"The Romish schools in London are swarming with Protestant children, who are being indoctrinated and trained at first hand by Romish teachers, not at second hand, as in the Church of England schools. How can this be proved? By asking for a Return of Protestant children who are attending Roman Catholic schools in the London School Board district. Once in these schools, we know what will happen. How, then, have these children got into Romish schools? Not certainly by the wish of their parents, but against it. They are driven into these schools by the direct action of the employees and officials of the London School Board. This is the process. A poor working man's child presents himself or herself for admission to a Board school. The signs of the parents' hard lot are visible on the child. Though clean, his or her clothes are not so good—they are most likely patched, and not cut in the latest fashion—as the poor hard-worked mother has been the tailor. The superior head teacher looks at the child, sees at a glance the class it belongs to, and does not consider it fit companion for the well-clad children of the clerks and tradesmen, whose children are getting a superior education for nothing at that school. So the superior head teacher shakes his or her head, and, under one pretence or other, illegally refuses to admit the child. The visitor then comes round and finds the child not in attendance. The mother reports the refusal. The visitor then, instead of reporting the refusal to headquarters, as he is bound to do, for his own ease, or to please the teacher, suggests the Romish school. The poor parents, harried by the school board, are driven, for the sake of peace, to send the children to the last place they would otherwise wish them to go."

The right hon. Gentleman, I perceive, does not believe the truth of this statement. I hope means will be taken to verify it.

SIR J. GORST: I do not disbelieve the statement. I say that is a question affecting the gentlemen composing the school board.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: Let me go to another point—the use to which Anglican training colleges are put by the extreme clerical party. I do not know how far I will be allowed to advert to this question, but I may point out that nearly all the certificated teachers for Voluntary schools are trained in denominational residential training colleges, the great bulk of which belong to the National Church. There are forty-four residential training colleges and only fourteen day training colleges, so that many Board School teachers are also taken from the former; and I wish to point out to the House that the examining bodies of these colleges can lay down what rules they choose for the entrance of students. They can exclude altogether Protestant Nonconformists unless they abandon their faith; but they may go further than this. I strongly suspect they have the power of excluding even Protestant Churchmen, because I find that the heads of some of these colleges are Ritualists, members of the English Church Union and the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament. The principal of Culham College in the Oxford diocese is a member of Lord Halifax's Society, the English Church Union; so is the chaplain of Truro College. The National Society undertakes to examine the candidates for admission to these colleges on religious knowledge, and the majority of its examiners I am told are Ritualists believing in sacerdotal doctrines, and the Rev. Canon Brownrigg, its general secretary, is a member of the English Church Union and formerly of the Holy Cross Society.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I cannot hear a word he is saying.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I was saying that the Rev. Canon Brownrigg, the general secretary, is a member of the English Church Union and formerly of the Holy Cross Society.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not know what the religious views of these gentlemen have to do with the Board of Education Vote.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I bow to your ruling, Sir, and will merely ask the right hon. Gentleman whether even should these colleges believe in auricular confession he has a right to offer advice——

SIR J. GORST: No; none whatever.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: And I wish to know from the Vice-President whether it is competent for the examining body to exclude from any training college Protestant Churchmen who refuse to profess faith in auricular confession; or is the Department powerless? This is a vital question for the future of this country. I wish to ask whether the large grants which the Education Board gives to Anglican residential colleges will be withheld if they recommend the students to go to confession, as is done in several theological colleges?

SIR J. GORST: No.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: Then I would like to know what is the meaning of this article in the Day School Code dealing with admission into training colleges. Article 118 (page 27, Code of Regulations)—

"The Department may refuse to recognise in a training college any student who has, subsequently to the publication of the list of Queen's scholars, signed an engagement to enter another training college without the written consent of the authorities of the latter college. In other respects the authorities of each college settle their own terms of admission."

And, again, what is the force of Article 119—

"Upon proof by the authorities of any college that candidates have not fulfilled the conditions signed by them on admission into the college, the Department may refuse to grant parchment certificates to such candidates, or to recognise them as certified teachers"?

SIR J. GORST: The conditions to which the hon. Gentleman refers are the conditions which shall be required in the teacher.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I hope it may be so, but it is put down here in the most extreme form. May I further ask the Vice-President if the cognisance of the Department extends to the manuals of history taught in training colleges? Is it held that any version of English history, however falsified to suit Ritualist prejudices, may be drilled into the pupils at these colleges? This is no imaginary evil. A class of historians has recently appeared who unite in one aim, that is, to disparage the Protestant Reformation, and to vilify the reformers of the sixteenth and the Puritans of the seventeenth century. I wish to know if the Department has anything to say about historical teaching, concerning which that accurate historian, Mr. J. Horace Round, states—

"The matter becomes really serious when our schools are flooded, through the agency of the clergy, under the guise of faithful history, with treatises in which notorious facts are either ignored or explained away."

Is the Vice-President aware that the Archbishop's chief inspector of religious knowledge in training colleges holds up to admiration in his text book absolutism in Church and State, and praises as great Englishmen Archbishop Laud and Charles I., while he holds up to contempt the reformers of the sixteenth century, and Puritans like Cromwell, Hampden and Milton in the seventeenth? This is an age of Imperialism. The present Government represents the Imperialistic spirit. It plumes itself on binding the colonies to the mother country by the closest of ties. It also wishes, in which I entirely agree, to cement a cordial alliance with our kinsmen in the United States. A great Anglo-Saxon confederation looms in the distance as an ideal which fires the imagination of millions. Is this likely to be brought about by insulting the memory of the Puritan settlers in New England; by describing the vast Protestant communities of America, Canada, and Australasia as "Protestant heretics"; by training up the next generation of Englishmen to despise the men who founded the great Commonwealths across the ocean? The best blood of the New World came of the victims of priestly tyranny in this country. The men of the "Mayflower" are held in reverence both in the United States and in Canada, and here we have a reactionary school of clericalism insulting their memory and holding up priestly bigots to the admiration of the rising generation. Will not the same result happen in this country as in France? The Dreyfus case shows the lengths to which priestly bigotry will go. France is divided into two nations—the clerical and the anti-clerical—and each tries to destroy the other. So it is in Italy; so it is fast coming to be into every European country. Are we to see England rent into clerical and anti-clerical through the abuse of our national system of education?

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman must really address himself to the question before the Committee.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: Then I will not pursue that, but will turn to the school board question.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The Board of Education has no control over that. The school board depends upon the electorate.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I will ask your ruling upon this, Sir. Suppose a school board breaks the education law by requiring a catechism to be taught, is there no power in the Executive to require the Board to comply with the law?

*THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Gentleman alleges that there is some power in the Board of Education which the Board has not exercised, and that the law has been broken in any particular, of course the hon. Gentleman is entitled to go into it. I understood the hon. Gentleman to complain that in certain school boards certain gentlemen hold certain religious views. Clearly the Board of Education has nothing to do with that. That has nothing to do with the Education Vote.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: The Liverpool School Board endeavoured to introduce a catechism into the Board schools. When the Vice-President was asked whether it was legal, he replied that it was so because not distinctive of any denomination. I altogether deny this construction of the Act of 1870. It forbids all formularies distinctive of particular denominations. This catechism was based upon one published under the auspices of the Free Church Council—in my opinion an excellent compendium of Bible teaching, yet I hold it was a colourable evasion of the Act of 1870 to teach it in Board schools. I am told it has now been withdrawn. A similar attempt has been made to introduce catechetical teaching at a board school at Seacombe, in Cheshire; and at the Board school at Church Coppenhall, near Crewe, the rector, who was chairman of the school board, displayed the parish almanac in the Board school, containing the following statements—

“Registration means that a child of wrath has been born into the world. Holy baptism means that your child is born again of water and the Spirit. We are not Christians until we have been christened or baptised.

“The supernatural powers entrusted to the first Apostles for the benefit of men’s souls, and the authority delegated to them by Jesus Christ, are still given to every bishop and priest at his ordination. The clergy of the Church are the true successors of the Apostles in this kingdom.

“The Church of England is a true portion of the Catholic Church, being the same Church as existed in this country before the Reformation. She never calls herself Protestant—a word we must carefully avoid if we would be true to our spiritual mother.

“Confessions are received every Saturday evening from 7.30 to 8.30, when the rector will be found in the Church, and at other times by appointment.”

In reply to a question I put, the Vice-President replied as follows—

“My attention has been called to this almanac by the hon. Member in question. The Education Department does not seem to have any power to interfere in the matter. . . .

The only thing the Education Department have power to prohibit is a catechism or a formulary. An almanac is neither the one nor the other.”†

SIR J. GORST: I think the hon. Gentleman should also in fairness state that the instant attention was drawn to the almanac it was taken down on representation being made.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: It would not have been taken down but for the question being raised in this House. I will say in conclusion that the administration of the Education Acts is thoroughly partisan under the present Government. It is inspired by an unworthy jealousy of the School Board system, and is directed by the clerical party led by the small body of High Churchmen who co-operate with the hon. Member for Rochester (Viscount Cranborne), and the hon. Member for Greenwich (Lord Hugh Cecil). The personal opinions of the Vice-President are much more liberal. He is an excellent educationalist. Were he not hampered and trammelled by his clerical supporters he would administer the Department in a liberal and progressive manner. But we are bound to make our complaints to him, as he alone in this House represents the Education Department; and I hope that ere this debate concludes he will give some reply to the various cases of complaint we bring against the administration of his Department. I move to reduce the salary of the Vice-President by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Item A (Salaries) be reduced by £100, in respect of the Salary of the Vice-President of the Council.”—(Mr. Samuel Smith.)

SIR J. GORST: The duty of the Education Department is to keep itself entirely clear of religious controversy. Its functions in regard to the religion which is taught in denominational and School Board schools are of the most limited character. The Department has only two functions to perform. One is to see that the Conscience Clause is substantially observed, that is to say, to take care that every parent who desires in a denominational school or in a Board school to withdraw his child from the religious instruction which is given is not intimidated, but is really at liberty to withdraw the child. With the religious instruction given the Education Department has nothing whatever to do; and if it were to interfere and to dictate to the Roman Catholics, for instance, what particular religion they should teach, or to the Wesleyans or the clergy of the Church of England what particular religion they should teach, it would be entirely transcending the functions committed to it by Parliament, and would be guilty of a gross dereliction of duty. As far as I know, the hon. Member has adduced no instance in which a parent during the administration of the present Government has been practically unsupported by the Education Department in his right to withdraw his child from any religious instruction. The other duty in relation to religion thrown upon the Board of Education arises under the prohibition under the law of school boards from teaching a catechism or formulary of a distinctly denominational character. The Act provides that where complaint is made that such a catechism or formulary is being taught the Education Department shall decide judicially whether such catechism or formulary is of a denominational character, and the decision of the Education Department is final. I am very glad to say that in my time a case has never arisen for judicial decision, though there have been threatenings in that direction. There was what appeared to be a serious case at Liverpool, where a catechism was framed by a school board, and at one time it looked very much as if a judicial decision would be required from the Department whether that particular catechism was or was not a violation of the law. Of course, had it become the duty of the Department to decide that question, the Department would have used its best ability in arriving at a final decision. But, happily, we were not required to do this, for the local school board withdrew the catechism. At the present time there is a case pending—I do not know whether it is the case the hon. Member has referred to—in which certain members of a school board have complained that the use of the Apostles' Creed and "My duty to God and to my neighbour," taught in a Board school, is a violation of the clause. That is alleged by certain members of the

Sir J. Gorst.

Board, while other members take an opposite view, and the question is, I believe, nearly ripe for decision. The last time I had to do with it I directed the parties to make any addition they desired to the correspondence that had taken place, and it would then become the duty of my noble friend the Lord President of the Council and myself to come to a judicial decision to the best of our ability. It appeared to me in my innocence, before I was called upon to decide judicially, that our "duty to God" was a proposition upon which there had been agreement among all creeds, and that "our duty to our neighbour" expressed exactly the sort of opinion Pagan philosophers of old would have maintained. If the question does come up for decision I will try to disabuse my mind of all preconceived prejudices, and, in conjunction with my noble friend the Lord President of the Council—and possibly with the assistance of the law officers of the Crown—we will come to the best final decision we possibly can. But that has never been done yet; the Department has never yet exercised this very serious power conferred by the Act. These are the only two particulars upon which the Board of Education has a right to trouble itself or take any side whatever in religious controversies in regard to school teaching. As to criticising an almanac or a history of the Prayer Book, or giving an opinion on the ritualistic proclivities of teachers or managers, in any attempt of that kind we should be guilty of a gross violation of the duty of the Department under the Act. The hon. Member for Flint has referred to instances of Protestant children being sent to Roman Catholic schools. But that is according to law. As the law stands, a parent is entitled to a free place in a local school, and, on the other hand, a school board has no right to build additional school accommodation so long as free places are to be found in existing schools. The Education Department does not take cognisance of the religious denomination of the school; all it does is to ascertain through its inspector whether there are free places in the school, and as long as there are free places we have no jurisdiction. It is not for me to say whether that is a satisfactory state of the law; if in the opinion of the hon. Member it is not, then his efforts should be directed to inducing Parliament to pass a law providing for every child a free place in a school of the denomination to which the parent belongs, and that might alter the present state of things. But as the law stands, all the Department can do is to give the child a free place in a school where such place exists, and not until all the places are filled has the Department power to require a school board to build an additional school.

LORD HUGH CECIL (Greenwich): I understand, according to your ruling, it is impossible to go to what may be called the bottom of the question, and I will only detain the House for a few moments in regard to what fell from the hon. Member for Flint. He referred on this occasion, and also on a previous occasion, to a large number of instances of grievances, which, of course, it is quite impossible to test on the spur of the moment. He referred on this occasion to a book which he quoted from on the last occasion, and he repeated the accusation against that book, which he said is used, or intended to be used, in schools and training colleges, that it is fundamentally opposed to the whole tenor of the Reformation. Of course, it would not be in order to comment on what the hon. Member said on a previous occasion, but I may be allowed to say that I have had an opportunity of looking into the matter he instanced on the last occasion, and the impression left on my mind is altogether different from what he said in regard to the book. He mentioned one foolish book which he said was written by the principal of a training college, but he did not tell the House that the author had ceased to be principal for sixteen years, and that it is a book which is exceedingly difficult to get. In answer to my application the publishers stated that they had only some copies in quires, and I am told by the National Society, though millions of books pass through their hands for purposes of education, they have never had any application for this particular book. I think the impression the hon. Member gave was that it was an extraordinary kind of book, which was being used in a training college.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg pardon, I did not say that. I merely stated that that book represented the teaching in that particular training college.

LORD HUGH CECIL: Sixteen years ago. The hon. Member referred to another book in the Church History series, and commented severely on the fact that it made no mention of the reign of Queen Mary. Had he studied the book more closely he would have found that the reign of Queen Mary is altogether irrelevant to the "History of the Prayer Book." The writer refers to the first Prayer Book published during the reign of Edward VI., and mentions several reasons why it caught the mind of the English nation. The first reason is—

"It was Scriptural. The English people have always loved the Bible, and the new translations of that Book in strong, intelligible English had deepened the feeling of reverence for it; the country welcomed the fuller and more systematic use of the Book, and the discarding of apocryphal and childish legends."

The truth is that the author holds the opinion which has always been recognised, that the Puritans of the seventeenth century were mistaken men, and that the Church of England suffered at their hands. That is an opinion perfectly loyal to the Church of England, and one perfectly proper to teach. Let the Committee observe critically the position they are put in. The hon. Member comes forward and makes accusations. When we try to test the charges we find they bear a different interpretation from that he puts upon them. Although no one disputes that the hon. Member is perfectly sincere, his recklessness of assertion is such that it would be foolish for the Committee to accept on his authority all his statements or any of his statements with reference to the books taught in the schools. He also spoke of breaches of the law. I was surprised to find that he seemed to think the Liverpool Catechism had a Romanising tendency. As a matter of fact this particular catechism was taken out of the Nonconformist catechism drawn up by distinguished Nonconformists.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I agree with the noble Lord, and I am glad to hear him speak so well of it, but I hold that the teaching of the catechism in a Board school is contrary to law.

LORD HUGH CECIL: I quite understand. At any rate, this case is of the class the hon. Member mentioned. It is a grievance not against the particular teaching a clergyman may give at a school, but it is a grievance against teachers generally, because they do not teach what the hon. Member approves. It would be a feeble remedy for the grievance merely to stop the clergy from teaching the children. It would be an impossible remedy, for you would have to go into an elaborate inquiry on controversial ground before you could determine whether in this particular school or that particular school it was improper to take the children to service. You would have to create in the Education Department a tribunal to deal with such questions. It is perfectly impossible to prevent the clergy from taking children to services of that kind. I do not know whether they do or do not. It might or might not be an offence against the ecclesiastical law, but it is not one on which the Department can intervene. We have always recognised that it is very unfair that in a large part of the country there should be only Church of England schools, and that Nonconformists should be obliged to send their children there, but the remedy is in the hands of the Nonconformist leaders. If they will agree with us that the true principle of education is that every child should be brought up in the belief of its parents, the whole question will be solved in a very short time. If the Nonconformist leaders will extend that measure of consideration they claim for themselves to the Church of England, a friendly arrangement might be come to by which the education of this country should be resettled, not on the present undenominational basis, but on a denominational basis, and then the real Nonconformist grievance would disappear. We will most gladly enter into any kind of discussion with Nonconformists with the object of meeting their views if the Nonconformists are equally ready to meet ours. We have over and over again said to Members in this House who are interested in this matter that it really rests with the Nonconformist leaders to say whether or not the religious question shall continue or be brought to a friendly settlement. We must all recognise how great an obstacle to educational progress is the fact that there are two religious bodies contending over the school children. From our point of view it is inevitable; we consider that religious education is the most important part of education, and we can never consent to sacrifice the most important to the less important part. None the less, from an educational point of view it is deplorable. I think there is nothing more absurd than to contemplate the attitude of the different religious bodies respecting educational reform; the question at the back of their minds is, "How will this affect the controversy between denominational and undenominational schools?" They remind me always of two cats, who watch one another in an attitude of constant suspicion, varied by occasional imprecation. We witnessed it this year over the block grant. I myself spent a great deal of time in considering what the effect of the block grant would be on denominational schools, and I have no doubt those interested in the opposite point of view were exercised by similar considerations. From an educational point of view that is undoubtedly ridiculous. Religious peace on the educational question can be easily brought about if Nonconformists are prepared to accept the fundamental proposition that the determination of the religious education of the child belongs to the parent.

MR. BIRRELL (Fifeshire, W.): I am glad that the noble Lord has so clearly explained to the Committee that the great obstacle in the way of a good system of education in this country is not the attitude assumed by the parents, but the attitude assumed by religious proselytisers on both sides of the House belonging to different kinds of religion. It is a most extraordinary thing that in none of the instances of alleged grievances in regard to religious education have we heard anything of the parents. I have a curious case of that in my own constituency in Scotland. Scotland is generally supposed to be a Protestant country, but there is in my constituency in Fife a Roman Catholic school which is the only school in the district, and whither Protestant children come. I have had political meetings in the school attended by the Protestants of the district. I have often been told by religious agitators, who abound in that neighbourhood, that it is a monstrous grievance that the children of Scotch Presbyterians at the latter end of the century should be obliged to go to a Roman Catholic school within a few miles of the ancient town of Dunfermline. I have always said that I will agitate and grow excited over the matter the moment I am requested to do so by the parents of any of the children who are condemned to go to this school. I have said it in the school, and in the newspapers in the district, but from that day to this not a single complaint has ever been made to me personally or through the post by any of those parents, and I do not believe the Protestantism of that parish is less sound than that of any throughout the length and breadth of Scotland. My hon. friend the Member for Flint has spoken of the grievance of sending a child to a "Romish" school. It would be a grievance if a Protestant child—or rather a child of Protestant parents, for I do not see why we should brand a child with the religious idiosyncrasies of its parents—were sent to a school during the hours when the special doctrines of that branch of the Christian Church we call Roman are taught, but there is no allegation that that is the case. There is no allegation of proselytising being the result to children sent to these schools. I do not think any Presbyterian parent need be under any apprehension in sending his child to a school called Roman Catholic if the Conscience Clause is observed, or even if it is not. At different periods of my life it has been my lot to learn both the shorter catechism of the Church of Scotland and the catechism of the Church of England; neither I nor my parents were Presbyterians or Anglicans, yet I learnt both these catechisms without any injury whatever to my independence of mind. Of the two catechisms the document of the Church of England is the least denominational I have ever learnt. In fact this is not a question of the parents or of the children, it is a question of the agitators belonging to religious bodies, who think the children should belong to them when they grow up. A religiously-minded parent deeply holding and strongly attached to a religious opinion or an irreligious opinion can send his child with perfect safety to a Board school or to a denominational school, to whatever denomination it belongs. I can instance the case of a man for whom I have great respect, who entertains the very strongest Agnostic opinions, whose children have received at a London Board school special commendation and prizes for a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. My Agnostic friend has no objection whatever to his children being so instructed. He would, indeed, be a fool who in these days would deprive his children of the benefit of sharing a knowledge common to the rest of the human family. I think in this matter we ought to deal out to Anglicans the same measure of justice we are prepared to deal out to Roman Catholics. The Roman Catholics belong in this country to a poor class. Many of the parents lead lives in which they become indifferent Catholics, and the priests and others interested in the Roman Catholic faith feel it a duty to provide the children with schools, which are really missionary schools. A man, if he really cares for his religion, can himself instil it into the minds of his children. We are told over and over again that it is a monstrous crime that we do not provide Anglican schools, so that Anglican parents may have the pride and satisfaction of sending their children to them. But if the parents care a snap of the finger for their Anglicism they will see that their children on Sundays, and in Sunday schools, are instructed in the doctrines of Christianity. The fact is that an enormous number of parents in this country are totally indifferent to and ignore religion altogether. They may think it a good and desirable thing for other people, or say at Election time that they wish their children to receive religious education, but personally they are indifferent to it. Consequently the religious bodies are really missionary societies, and they watch each other, as the noble Lord has said, like angry animals to see that no proposal made in this House interferes with what is really a missionary enterprise—namely, teaching the children of this country distinct religious dogmas. We must make up our minds whether we wish the education of this country to be religious or non-religious, and I quite agree that the time has come when we may advantageously reconsider that question. I dislike the notion of all the schools of this country being denominational, and I hope there will always remain a large number of persons who will be satisfied with what is called Board school religion, which, as the Archbishop of Canterbury has admitted, I think cheerfully, is a very excellent form of Christianity. Though it may not be enough for some people, I should have thought in other cases it might supplement the deficiencies at home. I should, indeed, be sorry if it were thought necessary to stamp every school in the country even during one hour of the day, with distinctive religious opinions. I only rose to ask the House to bear in mind that the grievances are grievances of the religious bodies and not of the children. I think no instance has ever been brought home to my mind that the children of Nonconformists are subjected in the schools to treatment of which they need be frightened. In the training colleges, Nonconformists who wish to adopt the teaching profession undoubtedly do suffer an intolerable wrong. It may be said that the Nonconformists should establish training colleges of their own, but the fact remains that we have supported out of the public purse training colleges to which it is practically impossible for Nonconformists to obtain an entrance. They therefore are cut off from one of the grandest opportunities of doing public service that are open to the young men of the present day and of time to come. I do think the Church of England would do well, exercising the great authority and power it does in this matter, if it did all it could to extend these advantages to Nonconformists, who are every bit as pious as churchmen themselves, and who, after all, entertain and share for the most part the great bulk of their opinions, and who are well qualified to contend with the scepticism and materialism of the age, which is a far greater danger than any which has been named, if they were allowed to enter the schools. The right hon. Gentleman is very sympathetic in these matters, but somehow he does not seem able in the Department to which he belongs to give effect to the principle he puts forward. Whether there is an influence by his side which interferes with the carrying out of the excellent, magnificent, and enlightened opinions which he holds, I do not know, but I do not think that during the time he has held his present office the application of the principles he has so often expounded has been very greatly extended throughout the country.

*MR. HUDSON (Hertfordshire, Hitchin) said there was one point which had not been brought before the Committee, but upon which he had received a large number of letters from various schoolmasters throughout the country, and that was the question of the right of appeal from the decision of the managers. A good deal could be said on both sides of the question, but certainly in nearly all the States of Europe, and in all the Colonies, the masters had the right of appeal. In this country under the recent Act the teachers had to pay part of their salaries to a pension fund, the whole of which payments they lost if they were dismissed. There was no doubt that cases did occur in which masters were dismissed for insufficient cause, one instance being a case in which a master was dismissed because in the evening he managed the village library. It was but fair that there should be the right of appeal, either by a clause being inserted in the contract that all masters and managers had to sign, that masters should not be dismissed without reasonable cause being assigned; or to the Education Department itself.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I should like to add a few words in support of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. All over the country teachers feel the disability under which they suffer, and to which reference has been made, to be a very acute grievance. Evidence of this comes from the whole of the country, from north to south. The grievance has been felt for many years past, but it appears to the teachers to be peculiarly unjust to them since the passage of the Superannuation Act under which their incomes are affected. They are now compelled by law to pay in a portion of their salaries to provide superannuation for themselves, and it is therefore peculiarly wrong that either the school board or denominational managers should be at liberty to send them about their business without any reason being assigned, seeing that by such dismissal they lose the payments they have made. It is a very small matter that these people who do such excellent work ask at our hands. You, Sir, have told us that we can speak only of what the Department can do. I hope I may be allowed to say that when we vote money for the Department we ought to be at liberty to say what the Department ought to have power to do. It seems to me that the Department ought to have the power, and to exercise it, of insisting that every teacher should be under agreement, and whether or not the words were in the agreement they should be supposed to be there, that no teacher should be dismissed without reasonable cause assigned. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of some action which I have taken in opposition, as it happens, to the policy of the National Union of Teachers. The teachers have desired that they should be more rather than less free to inflict corporal punishment. I have had an interview with a number of teachers in my constituency, at which they laid before me their view that a diminution of their power was a derogation of the dignity of a noble profession. At the end of the interview they put before me this grievance with regard to unjust and capricious dismissal. I asked them what would be the position with regard to the question of unjust or capricious dismissal if the meeting before me had been one not of elementary school teachers, but of clergymen of the Church of England. I said that the clergymen would probably have addressed to me exactly the same argument in favour of their freedom to dismiss teachers as the teachers had used with regard to their freedom to inflict corporal punishment upon children—that the clergymen would have said that any diminution whatever of the power now in the hands of managers of schools would be a derogation of the dignity of a noble profession. To my mind it is a very strong argument, though I do not know that it is a very noble one, that those who pay the piper should call the tune. It is the nation and not the managers of the school who pay the teachers, and therefore it is right that there should be an appeal granted to the teachers against any dismissal which they consider to be unjust or capricious.

*MR. TALBOT was understood to express a desire to correct a misstatement of the hon. Member for Flintshire with regard to training colleges. He was not going to enter into the question of the teaching given in the colleges. The colleges formed an important part of the educational equipment of the country, were directly under the control of the Vice-President of the Council, and therefore came under discussion in connection with the Vote then being considered. The grievance alleged by the hon. Member for Flintshire was that the training colleges were almost exclusively in the hands of the Church of England, and that therefore Nonconformists had cause of complaint. But if Nonconformists considered they had a grievance in that matter the remedy was entirely in their own hands. The Church of England training colleges, to which it was said Nonconformists had no access, were founded by members of the Church of England, assisted, no doubt, by the State. There were plenty of wealthy Nonconformists, and why did not they come forward and establish Nonconformist training colleges? Any sort of training college could be built—

SIR JOHN BRUNNER: But will they get a building grant?

*MR. TALBOT: Certainly not; nor could the Church get a building grant.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER: They could not now.

*MR. TALBOT was sorry that the conscience of the hon. Baronet had awoke too late; he should have built his training colleges a few years ago. At the present moment Nonconformists could build training colleges on exactly the same footing as members of the Church of England, and no doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President would give them every encouragement, while certainly the Church of England had no desire in any respect whatever to hinder the formation of such colleges founded by Nonconformists or anyone else. The Committee had been told that the supply of teachers was lamentably short. Here, then, was a grand opportunity, if there was a real want of teachers throughout the country, for Nonconformists to put their hands into their pockets and provide more accommodation; but until Nonconformists showed their confidence in their own principles by establishing training colleges they could not expect much weight to attach to their complaints.

MR. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): The subject which I wish to bring before the Committee is one that appeals to Members in a way very different from the important question which has just been somewhat desultorily discussed. I wish to bring before the notice of the Committee and of the Vice-President an omission from the purview of the Education Department in which I feel an interest is taken on both sides of the House; I refer to the poor law schools.

The points I wish to raise are extremely definite and practical, and I will detain the Committee very shortly in dealing with them. The Committee is perhaps not wholly aware that a very large number of the children of this country who are receiving elementary education are not under the control in any form of the Education Department in respect of that education. The children to whom I refer are the pauper children who do not attend ordinary public elementary schools in the district. There are here and there instances in which the children in the workhouses may be sent to public elementary schools in the neighbourhood, but those cases are very few, and owing to the necessities and the circumstances of the case that system cannot be very generally adopted. I do not refer to cases of boarded out children—they may no doubt attend ordinary public elementary schools—I refer generally to the great mass of the children of paupers who come under the influence of the poor law in this country. These children have an entirely separate system of education. They are educated by teachers who do not intermingle with, and who are really practically ineligible for, ordinary elementary school work. The teachers in poor law schools are a class apart; they are not submitted to the training which other teachers have to undergo, and the experience they gain does not fit them to be teachers generally for the Department. Some amelioration was made in this matter after I brought the question before the House a number of years ago, but that amelioration has been very small, and has had little practical effect. These teachers are not under the Education Department similarly to other teachers. In the next place, the education of the children is under the inspection not of the ordinary educational inspectors, but of inspectors of the Local Government Board. The result of these two facts is that the education given to our pauper children is given by inferior teachers, is of an inferior nature, and is wholly out of touch with the general education of the elementary schools of the country. I can appeal to Members on both sides of the House who have taken part in the work of the guardians to corroborate what I say as to the distinctly inferior nature of the education. Who need better teachers and better education so much as the pauper children? Such children would be described in the ordinary educational system of the country as peculiarly difficult children to deal with, and therefore as requiring a peculiarly good class of teachers. Under these circumstances there is another difficulty which arises. Our pauper children are not always in the workhouses. Their fathers and mothers may become paupers and then go out again, so that for a certain period of their lives the children are under the ordinary educational system of the country, and for another period they are under a totally different system—namely, the pauper children's educational system. The result is that they are very greatly thrown back in their education by the transfer from the one system to the other; their education is greatly hindered by the fact that when they pass from the one system to the other they do not fit in to the system to which they go in consequence of having been prepared in the system from which they come. What I am bringing forward is no theoretical difficulty. A number of boards of guardians have brought this question before the House and the Department from time to time in various ways. It was first brought before me by the board of guardians for the parish a part of which I represent in this House, and twelve years ago I brought the matter before the House in the following way. The Shoreditch Board of Guardians, being very anxious to take the children out of the influence of the workhouse, set up a school with a number of boarding houses in a country district a few miles out of London—Hornchurch, and there they carried on a system of education of as high a type as they could. Their difficulties have been just those difficulties which I have endeavoured to lay before the Committee, and they have urged the Department to take the education in the schools from under the inspection of the Local Government Board and to place it under the ordinary education inspectors. Other districts in London have felt the same difficulty, and have made the same request. Their desire has been to secure a better education for the children under their control. Of late others outside London have made the same request. The guardians of Birmingham are now bringing the matter before the Local Government Board or the Education Department, or both, and are making the same request. When I first brought the matter forward the Education Department was very anxious and willing to undertake the inspection of the education of these children, but the Local Government Board was at that time very much against the transfer. That was the block against any further proceeding at that time. But a few years ago when I again approached the Local Government Board, I found, to my gratification, that the Board, as represented by its present head and Parliamentary Secretary and officials generally, was strongly in favour of the change. Then I thought the case was gained. But when I approached the Education Department I found it had changed its mind, and instead of being in favour of, it was against the change. It is because the Education Department is now the unwilling Department that I bring this matter forward on this Vote. What was the answer when I brought this matter forward in 1897? What was the answer we received when a deputation waited on the right hon. Gentleman? The answer seems to have been of a very inadequate nature. First of all, the right hon. Gentleman said the education to be inspected was a very small portion of the real education of the children, that the real education consisted of the whole influences that are brought to bear upon them in their day to day work, etc., etc. But that argument equally applies to the whole work of the Education Department. The Education Department has to inspect and to certify, to deal with and to control, that portion of education in its widest sense which is comprehended in school work and dealt with by the school inspector. Beyond that, we are all well aware that the real education of the child, whether in the workhouse or at home, depends on many influences which go far beyond what the Board of Education can touch. As I understand, the right hon. Gentleman does not want to take over the inspection of the education of these children unless he has handed over to the Education Department the whole control of the every-day life of these children—of their food, clothing, habitation, and everything else. That may or may not be a very good thing, but it is a counsel of perfection surely, even from the point of view of those who desire it. I do not desire it. I frankly say that I do not think the Education Department of this country is a fit and proper body to take over the whole every-day life of the pauper children; I think that work is best left to the guardians, who are daily becoming more and more enlightened as to their duties. We need not, however, enter into that dispute, because even to those thoroughly in favour of that point of view it is a counsel of perfection, and would require a series of Bills or legislative measures which I do not think at the present moment or for many years to come any Government is likely to undertake. Under these circumstances I ask, why do you allow your schools to be such an enemy of good? Why do you refuse to take this one step because you wish at some future indefinite time to take some much larger step? So much for that particular argument. Another argument which the right hon. Gentleman used in his reply to us was that there was no means of enforcing the Report of the Department upon the guardians. The boards of guardians who desire to have their schools placed under the Education Department for the examination of teachers and the like are perfectly willing to have their grant depending, as any other school, upon the Report of the Local Government Board. It is perfectly clear, from the Report of the Education Department, that this is a mere matter of departmental arrangement. There are difficulties in it, but if the heads of the two Departments will put their heads together they can arrange that the boards of guardians shall be dealt with like any other school managers would be if they did not submit and fall in with the requirements of the Education Department. These are the main arguments, and I have tried to put the case as shortly as possible, so as not to delay the Committee upon this matter. I submit that our pauper children would receive a far better education if they were placed for the examination of their education and for their teachers' certificates under the Education Department than they can have if left under the Local Government Board. The Local Government Board is essentially not an educational body. The Board of Education has its experts, and it has devoted twenty-five years or more to the consideration of all educational problems. It has at its head a most thorough educationist in whom we feel great confidence. Why should we cut off our pauper children from all these good influences because of some theory of perfection which the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President of the Council seems to hold? I really think that the pressure and representations now made might at any rate lead the right hon. Gentleman to seriously reconsider this matter, for I feel confident that the minor details of the arrangements between the two Departments could be got over. I would like to make one suggestion. There are in this country something like 600 unions, and they have each got their own pauper children. It may be felt by both Departments—and I think I have the President of the Local Government Board with me in this—that a clean sweep to turn, willy-nilly, the whole of these pauper schools under the Education Department might be too sweeping a step. If that be so, then let us take those of the most important boards of guardians in the country who are now begging to have their schools transferred to the Education Department. Let us take them seriatim and try the experiment upon those who are willing. I do not say that that is exactly what I desire should be done, for I should like to see it done altogether; but if there be a difficulty in doing it altogether, here you have certain boards of guardians begging and anxious to be willing helpers in carrying out any new arrangement, and why not do it in respect to them? In 1863 and up till then the education of pauper children was under the Education Department, and not under the Local Government Board, but it was transferred from the Education Department to the Local Government Board because of departmental difficulties.

SIR J. GORST: Exactly.

MR. STUART: My right hon. friend agrees, and he thinks he makes a point out of it. Now I am going to make a point the other way. In 1863 you had boards of guardians dealing with the education of pauper children who were desirous of doing as little as they could for the education of those children. Now you have quite a different state of things, for the boards of guardians you can try the experiment with are extremely anxious to do their best, and I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite and the President of the Local Government Board will admit that certain boards of guardians for whom I am pleading are doing everything in their power to improve the education of their children. They are labouring hard to bring about this result, and the reason they are coming forward asking for this transfer is to make them able to do their work more effectively. This is not a pecuniary question with the boards of guardians. Of course the guardians now get a grant for these pauper children from the Local Government Board, but if the transfer took place they would then get a grant upon the Report of the inspector of the Education Department. I have looked into this matter in some of our most important poor law schools, and if you work out what they get now under the present system you will find that it is within a few pounds of what they would get under the block system. If it is anything it is a slight loss to the board of guardians to make the change to the Education Department. This is not worth counting, for their object is not to get a double grant, but to place their schools upon the basis under which they will be subject to reward and punishment, and under which they will secure an education for the children which they cannot secure now. Their whole object is to improve the education of pauper children, not to keep it back. I hope I have put this question without going beyond what is in order, and I do not wish to criticise the way in which the Local Government Board carries on this work. The Local Government Board does the best it can under difficult circumstances, but what I criticise is that the right hon. Gentleman and the Board of Education are not meeting the Local Government Board by effecting a transfer, which I think is desirable in the best interests of a class of children in this country who need good education more than any other class.

*MR. DAVID MACIVER (Liverpool, Kirkdale): No one can appreciate more than I do the services of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President of the Council, not only upon educational matters, but also throughout his whole public career. There is no one who more thoroughly agrees than I do with the admirable and interesting statement which the right hon. Gentleman has made to-night. But the immediate subject which I wish to bring before the Committee is not so much my right hon. friend's personal views as the administration of his Department and the effect which the new code is likely to have upon the great community of Liverpool. Upon this occasion I speak not only for my own constituency, but in reality for the whole of Liverpool. I feel that I owe an apology to the senior Member for Liverpool (Mr. Lawrence), who, on a recent occasion when a similar subject was under consideration, spoke with great authority for the people of Liverpool; and whom I do not wish to supplant. But I have been more recently in Liverpool, and only yesterday I had the case put before me very clearly by the Secretary of the Liverpool School Board. There is no difference of opinion there upon this question. I have also a further justification for venturing to speak on this subject, because some of the schools which are most hardly hit in Liverpool by what the Education Department propose to do are in my own constituency, and because the chairman of the Liverpool School Board happens to be a valued constituent of mine, and a gentleman who through long years, and with but scant remuneration and scant consideration for the excellent work he has done, has devoted his energies and abilities to the cause of religious teaching in Liverpool. I want to give the Committee the most recent statement which has been made with authority in Liverpool, and I will take the speech made by Colonel Morrison, who is a very well known and much respected Liverpool man, and who happens to be the vice-chairman of the Liverpool School Board. I will give a sentence or two from that speech, and I will quote just enough to show that we are not antagonistic, but that we appreciate and value the new Code and what it does, and we also value and appreciate the Minute of the Education Department, although we think that that Minute requires some alteration and amendment to meet the case of Liverpool and other communities in a similar position. Colonel Morrison said—

"The new Code was not so much a modification of what had gone before as it was a reformation, or even a revolution. No such far-reaching change had come over the spirit of the educational dream since the great Act of 1870. The vicious principle of payment by results was now gone, and they were introduced to a totally new atmosphere and completely different circumstances."

I will not trouble the Committee by any lengthy reading of extracts, but I do wish to show that we have the authority of Colonel Morrison, speaking for his colleagues, upon this question. He points out—

"Under these heads Liverpool Board schools would lose £1,020 per annum, and the losses to Voluntary schools would be severe. Many single schools in this diocese would lose £50, £60, and more per annum according to circumstances. Whilst this new Code undoubtedly did an immense amount of good by levelling up, it also levelled down and crippled numerous schools which had hitherto done good work."

Colonel Morrison went on to say—

"The Liverpool School Board had done their best to persuade the Board of Education to recognise higher classes in existing schools for the purpose of the Minute, and to give their grants for higher teaching in the higher classes providing the classes were reasonably organised to meet the necessary requirements of the Minute. So far, however, the Board had failed in its endeavours. He was convinced in his mind, and all the Liverpool Board were firmly convinced that this separate teaching in separate departments was educationally the greatest possible mistake. They have never followed it in the Liverpool Board; they had always gone exactly on the opposite principle, and he believed they were doing the very best for the education of the children."

I wanted to refer to the Church schools, but perhaps it is best that I should refer to the Wesleyan body, which at this moment would, I think, be especially appropriate. The Senior Wrangler of the year had his early training in a Wesleyan Voluntary school, and I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. P. H. Ingram, the principal of that school, a portion of which I will venture to quote to the House. He says—

"The Code as at present existing will have the tendency to level up poor schools and level down the better class schools, producing an average which is far below what is possible and what ought to and could be attained were all schools to be placed upon a thoroughly sound financial basis. The results of the new Minute cannot but tend to a lowering of the general standard of education throughout the country."

For one moment I will quote a sentence or two from what Canon T. Major Lester, the chairman of the Liverpool School Board, says in reference to his own schools. He says—

"This subject is becoming more grave and imperative as day after day passes on. We must lose on our two schools £70 yearly. The maximum should be 26s., and that amount would prevent extravagance and yet keep up schools. If so, we were blighted. If the Minute passes as it is, and our Voluntary schools are not allowed to compete for higher education, and must have two masters, and children leave us at the fourth standard, then we shall be wiped off and die out one by one."

The Liverpool School Board as a whole hold such views. The National Association of Voluntary Schools hold views which are practically the same as those of the Liverpool School Board. They consist of members of the Church of England, Wesleyans, Nonconformists, and Roman Catholics—all earnest and good men, and all desirous of doing the best they can for the cause of education. I will also refer for a moment to what I saw in to-day's local newspaper in a report of the annual meeting of the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church, which was held yesterday, and I want to emphasise a paragraph in the report of that society which harmonises absolutely with the views of the Liverpool School Board. This report says—

"The new Code of 1900 was, on the whole, welcomed by the Committee. The Block Grants were looked upon as a great step in the right direction, but the Committee hoped that the Board of Education would so carry into execution the recent Minute on higher elementary schools as to secure higher grade Voluntary schools from loss."

I do not wish to weary the Committee by speaking at any length, but since I came into the House I have received a letter from the secretary to the school board, and there are one or two paragraphs in that letter to which I ought at least to refer. He says, with reference to the Code and the Minute—

"To neither are they opposed in principle; but to the details of both they take serious exception, as calculated to injure rather than to benefit education as a whole. The evil, as you know, is confined to the better schools, and arises from the withdrawal of the Specific Subjects Grant. That grant amounts to only a little more than £36,000; but the whole loss falls on some 3,000 departments out of over 30,000. The loss averages about £12 per Department, but in many individual schools in Liverpool and other large towns it reaches from £40 to £80."

He goes on to say—

"Is it worth while for so paltry a saving to discourage so seriously as they are doing all the most enterprising schools of the country?"

There is another passage which it is my duty to point out to the Committee. The

Mr. David MacIver.

Vice-President of the Council made a calculation of the number of children affected by the withdrawal of the Specific Subjects Grant, and he made it out to be something very small indeed. I think he said it was something like 6 per cent. of the whole; but, as the secretary of the Liverpool School Board puts it, there is a fallacy which underlies that. He says—

"It is not only those who are now receiving such instruction that are affected by the matter. Those also are similarly interested, who, in the ordinary course, would in due time enter upon such instruction. Thus at least 1,260 children must be added to the 346,000 to find what proportion of the whole are affected, raising the total now interested to over 30 per cent."

They recommend that the following be added as an additional clause to the Minute—

"The Board of Education may apply the general terms of this Minute to the upper classes of any public elementary school which the Board is satisfied complies with the conditions of the Minute with regard to equipment, and to strength and quality of staff."

I have now almost finished, and I have to thank the Committee for so kindly listening to me. I have endeavoured as best I could to put before the Committee views which, although they are my own, have far greater authority behind them than if they were simply my own. The Liverpool School Board, as is perfectly well known, has always enjoyed the confidence of the whole district, and there are on the Liverpool School Board men of different religious views, all of whom are anxious to do their best for the cause of education. I do think that I have made out some sort of a case showing that one cast-iron rule ought not to be applied to rural and town districts. The circumstances vary. Liverpool is no inconsiderable place. Hon. Members have spoken of Wales, but what is the population of the Principality of Wales as compared with that of Liverpool? The population of Liverpool is more than half the entire population of Wales, and in Liverpool there is no doubt or hesitation whatever about this as to what is wanted. They approve generally of the New Code, but they say that the regulations as they understand them are going to work disadvantageously for the best class of schools in Liverpool, and they ask my right hon. friend and the Education Department to give their case reasonable and fair consideration, and to interpret their Minute in such a way as will help the Liverpool schools to maintain their position. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman has no desire to do any real injury to those excellent Voluntary schools.

SIR BRAMPTON GURDON (Norfolk, N.): The hon. Member opposite has made a strong attack upon the age at which children should go to school. Recently we have had largely to increase the number of our infant schools because hitherto we did not expect to have to find accommodation for children under five years of age, whereas it has been found that the working classes send their children to school as soon as they are three. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that it was not necessary to have any education for children below the age of five, and that under that age they ought to be running about the lanes all day. That might be all very well for a healthy boy of twelve, but children of six years and three years cannot run about the lanes all day, and they require some place for rest. There is a nursery made for them. In crowded centres their mothers have no time to attend to them, and there is no room in which they can be conveniently kept during the day time; therefore, to be able to send these young children to school is a very great boon to the working classes. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that there were some infant schools in which the infants were not altogether treated kindly. I do not know what is the rule of the Education Department with regard to the cane, but I certainly think it ought to be prohibited in infant schools, and I would think very little of the school manager who permitted it. I am happy to say that my experience has not been that of the right hon. Gentleman. I have seen nothing but kindness in infant schools. I believe it is now a rule of the Education Department that infants are not to be kept sitting still, but that they are, at the end of every twenty minutes or so, to be allowed to run around the room. The seats, too, are much more comfortable, and the infants' legs do not dangle down as in the old days. There is no light thrown on their eyes, and the schools are kept warm and well ventilated. My experience is that these little children are very fond indeed of school. The right hon. Gentleman told us of an infant school in which a half-witted girl was made a monitress in order to amuse the smaller babies, while the school mistress taught the older infants. It is very easy to raise a laugh in this House, but if we look at it from a common-sense point of view that was a very sensible arrangement. We all agree that babies of that age do not want teaching, and the right hon. Gentleman says that this half-witted girl was very kind to the infants, being no doubt actuated by that love of children generally inherent in half-witted people. It seems to me that it was a very sensible arrangement that this girl should have been allowed to keep quiet the very little children. I have seen so much of infant schools, especially in rural parishes, that I earnestly trust the right hon. Gentleman, notwithstanding the opinion enunciated this evening, will not make any alteration with regard to them.

MR. FLOWER (Bradford, W.): I desire to allude to the question of the tenure of teachers. It is a matter which arouses a very great deal of interest throughout the whole of the teaching profession, and which concerns teachers in Voluntary schools as well as teachers in Board schools. It is of course a matter which affects teachers employed under microscopical school boards rather than teachers employed in large school boards where the search-light of public opinion is promptly brought to bear on all cases of injustice or tyranny. However, this is a question on which all teachers are practically united, and it is one of very great importance to education, because on the quality of our teachers really depends our progress in educational matters. The fact that we have been fortunate enough in this Parliament to pass a teachers' pension scheme has given the question of tenure even more importance than it had before. It may now be said that we nurse teachers from the time of their apprenticeship up to the time of their certification. They are examined several times with regard to their physical health as well as to their intellectual capacity and personal character, but once they are certified they never know whether they will be continued in their employment for a sufficient period of time to entitle them to pensions, although they are compelled to keep up their pension payments. We differ in this respect from every other country in Europe, and I certainly hope that the right hon. Gentleman, who has always been a sympathetic friend to the teaching profession, will recognise the importance of dealing with this matter. It can be dealt with, I believe, by an article in the Code, and, if not, there will be no difficulty in passing legislation for the purpose during the present session. The only other matter to which I should like to direct the attention of the Committee is that of the poor law schools referred to by the hon. Gentleman for Hoxton Division. No one acquainted with the Report of the Committee which was issued in 1895 can fail to recognise the fact that children brought up in poor law schools suffer both in quantity and quality as regards the education which they receive. The whole Report, to which I believe the right hon. Gentleman was a signatory, is a condemnation of poor law schools. I frankly agree with the hon. Member for the Hoxton Division that if these schools are to exist at all it would be better that they should be under the inspection of the Education Department, but my point rather is that these schools ought not to exist at all. Guardians are, I believe, getting more enlightened, and if they chose to treat children in the proper way there would be no need to send them to the workhouses at all, and they would be freed from that taint which is always associated with the workhouse, and which will always attach to these poor law schools however much you improve the character of the education given in them. If a system of boarding out were adopted the children could attend the ordinary schools, and would be merged in the general child life of the country. Until that can be done I confess I think the Education Department would do well to take over the inspection of poor law schools. Their inspector's report would not, I think, be ignored by any board of guardians, and even if it were ignored, public opinion would be brought to bear on the more glaring defects and they would be remedied. I hope on both these matters we shall have a sympathetic assurance from the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. MATHER (Lancashire, Rossendale): The right hon. Gentleman has made a speech to-day which on the whole is very satisfactory to hon. Members on this side of the House, and the views he expressed are very much in sympathy with the views which we entertain also.

Mr. Flower.

His speech did not differ from others which I have read in former years, proving that the view he takes of national education is much broader and more liberal than the view generally held by the Government. With regard to the many subjects he brought forward very little difference of opinion can exist; but there is one omission to which I should like to direct the right hon. Gentleman's attention, and that is that no reference has been made by him to the state of things produced by the Minute which was discussed a few weeks ago. By that Minute the higher grade schools are placed, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, in a very uncertain position. They are no longer to be supported by special grants, which have been their chief means of subsistence. We are left in doubt as to how long higher elementary education is to be left in this suspended condition—partly in the air and partly on the ground. If this Minute is to be of any value—if it is to confer benefit on these higher grade schools—it would be well if it were carried out quickly. At the present time technical schools are practically empty during the day, though they provide, of course, excellent instruction in the evenings. If we were to provide a two years course for boys of fourteen years of age, coming from higher elementary schools, in the ordinary technical schools of the country in the daytime, we should fit them at sixteen years of age to become far more efficient apprentices in all the more scientific industries of the country, and also more fitted to engage in other walks of life, and in a few years we should have a totally different population. I am intimately acquainted with the systems prevailing in Germany, Switzerland, America, and elsewhere; and as one largely interested in the scientific industries of England, I feel we are suffering immensely for want of well-educated boys to come as apprentices or to take responsible posts, whereas in other countries there are hundreds of young fellows available for all the workshops, and after a few years in the shops they are placed in positions of responsibility. I am not speaking now of the higher technical schools, but of schools such as we have in Manchester, Salford, Liverpool, and elsewhere, and if we could throw them open during the day to scholars from the higher elementary schools, I am quite sure that the parents would only be too glad to send them, in order that they might be better prepared for the positions they are to occupy in after life. I regret, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman did not allude to the higher grade schools which he said on a previous occasion the Department intended to establish. I think it is a matter of very great importance, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough to inform the Committee what provision the Board of Education has made, or is about to make, to encourage the school boards and managers of Voluntary schools to establish higher grade departments in connection with their schools. I presume that the Education Department has considered the question as to how these higher grade departments are going to be established. I hope this is not one of the excellent "intentions" of the Education Department. We have heard a great many of them since the right hon. Gentleman has practically presided over the education of this country. I have the most perfect confidence in the right hon. Gentleman's intentions, but there appears to be some obstruction always in his way. He does not disclose all the facts to us, but his speeches indicate that there is always some lion in the path, or someone who throws cold water on all his excellent intentions. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give us some encouragement that the Board schools and also the Voluntary schools are to have facilities offered to them to start these higher grade departments. It would be a very cheerful announcement to the country, and we would all do what we could to assist the right hon. Gentleman to carry forward his good intentions. I should also like to allude to another omission in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He criticised the infant schools, but did not say how he would improve them. I differ entirely from the right hon. Gentleman with regard to infant teaching. My experience of infant teaching is based entirely on a system which I have almost all my life endeavoured to encourage—namely, the kindergarten system, carried out especially for the children of the working classes. The right hon. Gentleman gave an example of the kind of teaching to be found in infant schools; I should like to give another example, which, if he would do me the honour to consider it, might perhaps help the Department in making infant school teaching one of the most important factors, if not the main foundation of education in this country.

SIR J. GORST: At what age would you begin?

*MR. MATHER: At three years of age. In the town of Salford I erected an infant school for 400 "gutter" children who were trained on that system. They entered the school at three years of age, and proceeded to the Board school at six or seven. Not only were the habits of the children improved, but the habits of the parents were also improved through the influence of the children. So much was that the case in Salford that it was quite an interesting sight to all interested in education to visit the school to which I have referred. The teaching requires to be totally different from that given at the age of seven. Children at the age of three are in the most impressionable period of their lives. If they are allowed to ramble about the streets from their wretched homes they become vitiated without any criminal intent, and become imbued with ideas and habits that the elementary schools cannot remove. That is a very important part of the explanation as to why, after thirty years of excellent elementary teaching, so very few of the children of the working classes in after life do justice to the training and education they received at school. I believe it is because that from three to six—the most important part of child life—they are allowed to run around the streets and pick up habits and ideas which they never got rid of. The impressions which children receive during that period remain with them throughout their lives. Of course it is not attempted to teach such children their letters or to deal with them in any way on the lines of ordinary elementary education. That would be absurd and would merely damage the children, and make them mere machines. If the right hon. Gentleman would only go a short distance from this House, I could show him a kindergarten school where the children enter at three and remain until they are six or seven. He will find it a perfect paradise, and the children's lives are so happy that they would rather be there than anywhere else. Such was the effect produced by the Salford school to which I have referred, that the little ones came on Sundays, on holidays, and on Saturday afternoons, and knocked at the doors to be admitted into the school so that they might have the enjoyment which they could not get elsewhere. The whole neighbourhood, in fact, was changed by that school, and the homes were vastly improved by the better habits the children brought into them. At the first start of the school the mothers would threaten "to do for" the school mistress if she attempted to touch her children if they needed to be washed; but after a time not only did the children come to school clean themselves, but the mothers came with them clean also. Infant teaching may be carried out in a manner which is a blessing to the children and prepares them for the teaching in elementary schools and for after-life. I would only mention one other matter. It appears to me that teachers throughout the country generally who subscribe to the pension-fund require greater consideration than they now receive at the hands of the Education Department as regards summary dismissal. That is a matter which cannot be dealt with legally by the Department, but I think there is a moral obligation on the Board of Education, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it would not be possible that the unreasonable complaints and the summary dismissals from which teachers suffer might not be dealt with through the Department. I trust the right hon. Gentleman may be able to give us some further information with regard to these points. I can assure him that I have the highest regard for the excellence of his motives and for the good work which has been accomplished by the Department during the period it has been under his control.

SIR R. C. JEBB (Cambridge University): I desire to refer to the Minute of the Board of Education of April 6th, proposing to establish new higher elementary schools. That Minute, it will be remembered, fixed the age limit for higher elementary schools at fifteen, and it has come to my knowledge that some very able schoolmasters contend that their views in regard to the age limit have been incorrectly recommended to this House, and that I am the person responsible. I think I can clear up the point in a very few words. The document, generally known as the Joint Memorandum, was drawn up in 1897 as the outcome of a conference between associations which represented the head masters of the secondary schools and of the higher-grade schools respectively. That Joint Memorandum nowhere explicitly defined the age limit which the signatories thought desirable for higher primary schools, but there is one passage in it from which the age contemplated by the signatories might be inferred. That passage states that the higher primary schools ought to include pupils who had taken a three or four years course after having passed the sixth standard. Boys usually pass the sixth standard about the age of twelve or thirteen, and therefore four years after that would bring up the age to sixteen or seventeen for the higher primary schools. I was quite aware of that when I referred in a recent discussion to the Joint Memorandum.* I referred to it only for the purpose of bringing out those principles for the delimitation of primary from secondary education, which the Joint Memorandum embodies, and in regard to which it is a most important document, as being the first attempt at a concordat between the masters of primary and secondary schools. But one or two of those who signed the Joint Memorandum complained that I had represented them as thinking that the recognised limit for the higher primary schools should be fifteen. Looking at the official report of what I said in Hansard, I cannot find that I said anything which justified any such misapprehension. Since I have been assured that my remarks could be so interpreted, and have been so interpreted, in the country, I think it is only just and right to these gentlemen to say publicly to the Committee that I did not intend to claim these gentlemen as supporting the age limit of fifteen for the higher primary schools. Their view is that in the higher primary schools education should go on to the age of sixteen or seventeen. I thank the Committee for having permitted me to make this statement, and I will only add that in the passage which they complained of, I used the phrase "higher elementary schools," which is the phrase of the Minute, and not "higher primary schools," which is the phrase employed throughout the Joint Memorandum. The eminent services of these gentlemen to education in their own sphere entitle them to this clear and emphatic statement upon my part.

*SIR F. S. POWELL: I hope I am not violating the rules of the House if I express great regret that so large an amount, upwards of £11,000,000, should be included in the same Vote. It is a matter deserving of comment that so large a sum, dealing with such a miscellaneous body of subjects, should be included in the same Vote. I do not think it necessary to allude to the speech made by the hon. Member for Flint at an earlier period of our proceedings to-night; but as I am a member of the committee of the National Society, I feel bound to say a word on behalf of the secretary, the Reverend Mr. Brownrigg, who is not able to speak for himself. The hon. Gentleman described the rev. gentleman as belonging to an extreme party in the Church; that accusation is entirely unfounded. I have had the privilege of the acquaintance of Mr. Brownrigg for many years in connection with the Society, and I confess that I do not know at this moment to what school of thought he belongs. He is a loyal Churchman, entirely unattached to any section into which the Church at present is most unhappily divided. As a poor law guardian, I think the remedy for the disease of pauper children is to send them to the elementary schools. In Bradford we send all our pauper children, clad in ordinary attire, to the elementary schools, where they mingle with the other children and behave and acquit themselves in a very satisfactory manner. There is in my opinion no other solution for dealing with pauper children. You must separate them from the workhouse altogether, and hand them over to proper foster-mothers, and send them to the elementary schools of the country. Until that is done the pauper taint will continue, and all your labour will be in vain. With reference to the new minute in regard to which some discussion has arisen, I would like to make one remark. I refer to one article which deals with elementary schools which requires an attendance of two years at an elementary school before the pupil is entitled to attend the higher elementary schools. In Bradford we have a school, the children of which are in great difficulty. The school conducted by the college is broken up, the college having been transferred to the technical instruction committee of the City Council; and the children are not eligible for the higher elementary school under the Act because of the two years limit. I am told by those who manage our technical college at Bradford that these children suffer great hardship in consequence of the injustice of the new Code, and I am also told that there are Germans and others who do not know our language who have lately come to London who are morally entitled to these advantages. What experience may show generally as to the operation of that clause I do not venture to say, but I think the remarks I have made show that great care must be taken, and possibly some changes made in future years. Some questions were put earlier in the evening by the hon. Member for East Somerset, and the debate on this question has drifted, as unhappily it usually does, into a denominational question and a religious controversy. But I hope my right hon. friend will not omit to give a full reply to the hon. Member for East Somerset, as I am as anxious as he is to know what is the operation at the present time of Clause 7 of the Directory. I believe the right hon. Gentleman has taken great interest in the working of the clause, and I hope he will inform us in the course of this debate what districts are within the operation of this clause, and what prospect there is of a larger number of districts being so affected. I will not deal with the transfer from the Charity Commissioners to the Education Department, as in my judgment the minute is meagre and ambiguous. The friends of education do not feel certain to which Department application should be made in any given case. This is not a matter of secondary importance, it is one which deals with great institutions and has important relation to the future progress of education in this country. Until we are better informed on this subject those who have to conduct the operations of grammar schools and secondary education will feel under great difficulty. The present condition of affairs is a great impediment to education and progress. The hon. Member for East Somerset asked, and I desire also to know, what the decision of the Government is as regards the division in the new Board of Education between secondary and technical education—or rather between elementary education on the one hand and technical and secondary education on the other. Are secondary and technical education to be treated separately under two secretaries—one to conduct the technical and one the secondary department? I wish to express my great regret, as a member of the Council of the Victoria University and member of the Council of the Yorkshire College of Leeds, that larger grants are not made to our modern universities. The Victoria University, which deals with all England, but more strictly with Lancashire and Yorkshire, has a grant of £2,000 a year; the University of Wales has a grant of £4,000, double that which the Victoria University commands. I do not wish to diminish the grant for Wales, but to most emphatically and respectfully put in a claim on behalf of the Victoria University. The same remark applies to university colleges.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Member that the motion now before the Committee is to reduce the Vice-President's salary. The hon. Member cannot discuss other subjects under this particular motion now.

*SIR F. S. POWELL: I should wish to make some further remarks, but I am afraid I should be out of order if I proceeded. I must, however, express great satisfaction at the course of the debate to-night. I think it shows that the sympathy of the Committee is with the educational reforms which have taken place, and that we desire to see greater reforms, to which these are only preliminary. I hope the anticipations of the sanguine will be fully fulfilled, and that those who are called upon to take part in these debates in years to come will look back to this present day as the dawn of a better era of education.

*MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): We have listened to the speech of the Vice-President, which was of a most astonishing character, a speech not of a Minister, but of a Front Opposition Bench critic. We are accustomed here to Ministers contenting themselves with defending the maladministration of which they have been guilty. The right hon. Gentleman who sits in the seat of authority, who is responsible to this House for the administration of the Board of Education, has not coupled with his statements of what ought to be done, anything like a plain intimation that he will endeavour to carry out the suggestions he put forward. I regret that we have received from him no hint of that kind, because some of his suggestions are easy of accomplishment. We had from him a speech full of paradox and full of extreme instances, and I think the average teachers have a right to complain of some of the instances given. The Committee is told that infant schools of this country are conducted by trained persons guilty of ignorance and want of refinement and want of qualifications, and it is unfair that instances of the ignorance of Article 68 teachers should be quoted as typical even in extreme cases of these admirable women who conduct our infant schools in this country. The right hon. Gentleman complained that some of the school boards continued the bad old system of individual examination which the Department had abolished so far as it could. But I feel that in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman there is nothing in the shape of a hint that he intends to prohibit this bad old system from continuing, though he knows very well that he can do so by a stroke of the pen. The right hon. Gentleman complains that school boards and voluntary organizations are still proceeding on these old and antiquated lines; but why does he not stop it? It is only one of the cases of disparity between the ideals and the administration of which his speech is full. The right hon. Gentleman urges the necessity of encouraging day training colleges; but why does he not go on to say that he will try to induce the Treasury to provide the £10,000 per annum necessary to place them, in respect of grant, upon an equality of footing with the residential training colleges? With regard to the reform of inspection, a step forward was taken during the vice-presidency of Mr. Mundella, when the lower-grade inspectors were translated into sub-inspectors, and another step in the direction of reform was taken in the days of Mr. Acland, when one or two of them were made inspectors of schools, but since then the process has been arrested. One could perhaps put up with that, because it was what the schools had been accustomed to. But there was an ominous foreshadow in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to-night as to the appointment of sub-inspectors in future. We were told that in the old days when payment by results was in vogue it was necessary to have sub-inspectors, who had been teachers, but now the sub-inspectors might be men not qualified by experience in the schools to do that kind of work. I certainly formed the impression that it was the intention of the Board of Education in future to cease to appoint as sub-inspectors men who have been teachers in schools, and to appoint young men on the list of a University Employment Agency who have no experience in schools at all. I wish to point out that no matter how learned academically, how earnest and sympathetic, and how high his ideals in regard to education the inspector you send into the public elementary schools, if he himself has had no experience in a public elementary school, or of elementary school children, and does not know the limitations of their environment, or their ability, will pitch the key too high, and he will become unsympathetic, contemptuous, and perfunctory, except in very rare instances indeed. At present, if it were not for the sub-inspectors, who know from long experience what can be done in a school, and how far the limitations do apply and hamper, the inspection of the schools of the country would be carried out in a very imperfect fashion indeed. The lack of friction is often due to the fact that the inspectors who are sent to do the work without previous experience at all rely on the experience of subordinates—the sub-inspectors who have been teachers—and so difficulty is avoided. I would warn the Committee, and particularly the Vice-President of the Council, against any idea of stopping the appointment in future, to the lower grades of inspectorate at any rate, of men who by experience know something about the work and the limitations incidental to public elementary schools. I have met inspectors who have risen from the ranks of teachers in France, Switzerland, and Germany, and I venture to state that inspectors so chosen will compare favourably in every respect with the inspectors of this country. Another important subject is the relationship between the school managers and the teachers. Remarks have been made in this debate about the dismissal of teachers by the managers. That is an obvious difficulty, and I do not mean to dwell upon it. It might destroy a teacher's income for months or years. It might blacken his record. It might impair his chance of getting employment again. In some cases it might limit or annul his claim to a pension. There are difficulties of this kind every year, but I want the Committee to consider the effect upon children in a school where there is friction of this kind between the managers and the teacher. In many cases in my own knowledge the educational system has been upset for months and years by these quarrels and disturbances. Parents have withdrawn children from schools, and fresh schools have been opened. Parents have refused to recognise the teacher brought in at the point of the bayonet, so to speak, to replace the dismissed teacher. These things are known to the Board of Education, and to the inspectors and officials, and to hon. Members. I venture to hope that this debate will not close without an assurance being given by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President that the Department will undertake to do something to prevent this kind of thing in future, and to see that teachers obtain some protection against capricious dismissal. I heard of a case the other day where a teacher who was four months short of the period necessary to qualify for a pension was dismissed by the managers of the school. The dismissal of that teacher left him unable by four months to complete his term of qualification. He is approaching the age of sixty-five, and in this country it is true that a teacher over forty or forty-five has a very small chance of getting new employment at all. I venture to say that in all cases of that kind the Board of Education ought to interfere. The Board of Education is all powerful when once the Code is passed by the House. The Board of Education has the machinery and can satisfy itself as to the merits of any particular dispute. The Board could easily make it a stipulation that there shall be for the teacher and managers a form of agreement containing a clause which would give the teacher protection against unjustifiable dismissal. The Board could make it a condition of the grant that they shall retain to themselves the right to decide between managers and teachers in matters of dispute. I hope we shall have some assurance on these points. Can we have the extra grant for the training colleges? Can we be sure that the inspectors to be appointed in future shall be both men of academic distinction and experience in schools? Above all—and it is a matter of importance at the present moment, because of the operation of the Act of 1898—can we have from the right hon. Gentleman an assurance that he will, to the best of his ability, secure that teachers whose lives are in the right and whose efficiency is unquestioned, shall have protection against dismissal arising from difficulties of creed, politics, or temper without any reference whatever to the efficiency of the work of the school?

*COLONEL MILWARD (Stratford-upon-Avon): I desire to support in a few words the argument of the hon. Gentleman with reference to the dismissal of teachers owing to the friction between them and managers. I do not think the grievance very often occurs, but I feel that from time to time it is true that teachers are dismissed for inadequate reasons, and in that case they have no power of appeal. Although it is perfectly true that in many other walks of life men are dismissed from the positions they hold owing to the hardness of those who employ them, there is a difference in the case of school teachers who are quasi-public servants. I wish they were public servants altogether, but I think that in their present position they ought to have a right of appeal against arbitrary dismissal. A board of guardians cannot dismiss even the most humble servant without the right of appeal to the Local Government Board. I think the same thing should hold true in reference to school teachers, whose position is a difficult one and dependent upon a certain length of service for a pension. I admit that the right of appeal to the Education Department is a difficult question, but the difficulty might be overcome if a local educational authority was established. With a county or borough authority to which appeal could be made there would be a better chance of the real merits of the case being understood. The same may be said in reference to the complaints the hon. Member for Flint brought forward that teachers have taken advantage of their position to force upon the minds of children religious doctrines of which parents do not approve. Possibly there have been such cases, but I am convinced they have been few and far between. At the same time I have the greatest sympathy with Nonconformists who find themselves in a parish with only one school to which they can send their children, and in the management of which they have no confidence. On the other hand, it is quite clear that the country does not wish to see universal school boards, and that being the case, a local educational authority to which parents could appeal would be of the highest value. If there was a borough or a county authority, and if there was any complaint in regard to religious instruction it would be far easier to appeal to a local authority than to a central authority. May I say I think that all this points to the fact that the time is coming when there should be a review of the educational policy of this country. If you look to what is taking place in Convocation, and to the views expressed by educational authorities, you will find that there is a feeling in favour of a change. If the Government would have the courage of their convictions and introduce a local authority in education the alteration would give the greatest impetus that could be given to the education of the country.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (Wiltshire, Cricklade): I am glad to think that of all those questions referred to by my hon. friend below the gangway the right of appeal, or rather the grant of some right of appeal, to teachers against arbitrary dismissal, is perhaps the one that comes most home to the educational mind. I was exceedingly glad to hear what fell just now from the hon. Member who addressed the Committee, because it shows that these feelings are not confined to one side of the House. It is perfectly obvious that the importance of this question has grown enormously since Her Majesty's Government started a superannuation fund for teachers. Before that the question of the possible right of appeal in the case of a teacher was one which chiefly appealed to what may be called the sense of dignity and importance of the office of schoolmaster; but it did not, except in a minor degree and indirectly, carry with it considerations of the important pecuniary interest now attached to the office of schoolmasters, who are obliged by law, after a certain date, to contribute a certain sum from their salaries to the superannuation fund. If they are dismissed before they have contributed for the full period indicated, they are liable to lose their pension and also the benefit of their contributions. My hon. friend who addressed the House just now spoke of certain cases which were within his knowledge. I think he acted wisely in not giving names and places. It is quite clear that the matters involved in these cases are matters of great delicacy, and that to name the cases and the individuals would, perhaps, increase the sense of hardship by giving them special publicity. I can certainly say for myself that I am acquainted with details of cases of arbitrary dismissal upon inadequate grounds by both Voluntary school managers and small school boards. The question of poor law schools is of urgent importance in the metropolis and many of the larger towns, but less so in small towns and country districts because of the wise provision in the Local Government Act, 1888, by which county councils can pay the fees of children and charge them to the Exchequer contribution to the county fund. The effect has been to encourage boards of guardians to send children to public day schools, and in the county of Wilts I do not think any children are educated in the workhouses. What is really required in the great towns is the benefit of the same machinery, because the obvious difficulty is that the number of poor law children in the metropolis might be so great as to swamp the schools of the districts. In what he said about training colleges and the grievances of Nonconformist teachers the Vice-President has shown his desire to meet the difficulty and has indicated the right course to pursue. This is one illustration among many of the difficulties that arise from the system of attempting to combine the benefit of denominational education with the benefit of the School Board system. As many hon. Members have already said in this debate, and nobody said it more clearly than my noble friend the Member for Greenwich, you have the supporters of the Voluntary system and the supporters of the School Board system, like cats on the roofs of two opposite houses, engaged in rivalry upon this question. The only result is that the supporters of the Voluntary system are strong enough to prevent the School Board system doing a great deal of useful work, and on the other hand the School Board system is sufficiently strong in many cases to prevent the Voluntary system getting the benefits which might be obtained from it. What we in this House, who should try to control and still these unfortunate rivalries, really want to do is to see whether some system cannot be invented which will give fairplay to both these principles without bringing them to stand in one another's way, strong enough to thwart one another but neither of them strong enough to get the upper hand and carry out their educational work. I can perfectly imagine, though I should differ from it, that if Parliament was to say that the Voluntary system should alone be recognised, and the whole of our educational system be organised according to the religious views of different parents or different sections of opinion, it would be possible on those lines to organise a great system of education capable of producing very good results. I can also perfectly realise that if we had a great system of undenominational education under such boards or other public authorities, there also great and admirable results must accrue to the nation which established such a system. But we have been obliged, for the reasons which prevailed in 1870, to arrive at a compromise—as we nearly always have to do in England. I would venture to say to the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich that all the arguments he used and the similar arguments used by others in this debate were the same as were used in 1870, and we had to come back to the Cowper-Temple Clause and the unsectarian system of education which that clause gives, simply because every other system failed to obtain a majority of this House. The end of all those long and bitter debates was simply that we had to arrive at a compromise. I venture to say that if the noble Lord was Minister for Education and tried to reduce into practice the ideas he has brought forward, he would find after long debates that it was not in his power to bring forward sufficiently strong battalions to overcome the opposition which those ideas would excite, and we should have to come back to the point we reached as long ago as 1870. We should have to recognise both of these great classes—namely, those who desire to have Voluntary schools and those who desire to have the School Board system. In whatever way we follow out those ideas, we shall always have more or less to recognise that those two great classes of ideas do exist, and that whether we agree with them or whether we do not, they are held by large numbers of our fellow-countrymen. All we can do is to go on adapting and extending our machinery without attempting too much. The point we seem to have come to is as to whether or not we can attempt to meet what has been acknowledged by the Vice-President, the First Lord of the Treasury, and the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich to constitute the real grievance of Nonconformists—namely, that there are an enormous number of parishes in which the whole control of the education of the children is in the hands of one denomination, and that denomination the Church of England, so that presumably the child of Nonconformist parents must be withdrawn from religious education or accept a form which is not that with which the parents agree. The idea of the noble Lord appears to be that we must attempt in some way or other to revive the famous 27th clause of the Bill brought in by the Vice-President, by which the child of Nonconformist parents was enabled to claim to receive within a Church school—I do not know from whom, whether from the minister of its own religious denomination or from the teacher of the school—a different religious education, and that therefore in all these schools there should be two systems of religious education going on. When that Bill was brought in the clause was universally condemned. [An HON. MEMBER: Not universally.] Not universally, but by a great majority of this House, and in matters of this kind we are obliged to consider the majority. The Bill broke down very largely because that clause did not receive from any quarter an amount of support sufficient to float it over all the shoals and difficulties in this House, and I do not believe it would be any use whatever attempting to revive that proposal. I may be asked what is the use of my criticising these proposals if I have nothing to propose myself. I will only say that the real difficulty and grievance has always appeared to me to consist less in the question of the religious education given to the child than in the management of the schools. The real grievance of the Nonconformist is not that his child has to go to a school in which he may be taught something in regard to religion of which the parent disapproves. There are exceptions, but as a rule I believe the clergy of the Church of England are not as unreasonable as some people imagine in regard to the actual religious education given in the schools. There is an enormous amount of religious education given in Church of England schools which is of a character that the child of Nonconformist parents can very well accept. There are cases where it is not so. You occasionally have an indiscreet clergyman or curate who causes great commotion far outside his own district by introducing high-flown notions about sacerdotalism, or by bringing in a special catechism invented by some High Church society to which he belongs, but such things are exceptional. The real grievance is that in an enormous number of parishes the whole control and management is in the hands of the Church of England, which in practice means, is in the hands of the clergyman of the parish, and therefore everybody who is not a member of the Church of England is shut off from the management of the schools. That has a very bad effect in two ways. It causes in the minds of Nonconformists a feeling of injustice, and educationally it has the bad effect of preventing a large section—and very often the most active section, and the section which takes the most interest in education—from having anything to do with the village school. If you want to interest the parents and the community at large in education, the first thing to be done is to make every parent and ratepayer feel that the village school is his school, that he has something to do with it, that he is interested in the management of it, and that it is possible he may be called upon to be a manager. These are the considerations I venture to submit to the Committee in regard to this question of education in our rural districts. This is a question which mainly affects our rural districts rather than the towns. In the towns there are generally school boards, and even where there are not such boards the Nonconformists as a rule are able to keep up a British school, to which they may send their children without any fear of their religious conscience being interfered with, and in the management of which Nonconformist parents are directly represented. But there are larger questions than these upon which I would venture to say a word. I want to ask the Vice-President whether before this discussion closes it is not within his power to tell us something as to what his Department is doing in regard to the Education Act of last year. I read with the greatest pleasure an article this morning in a paper which is not generally considered to be a revolutionary paper, or which is never looked upon as anything but a staunch supporter of Her Majesty's Government. I mean the Morning Post. That article was one of almost extreme bitterness in regard to the conduct of the Education Department, of the noble Duke who presides over it, and of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, for their neglect in fulfilling the expectations raised by the Act of last year. The article stated that it could only assume that the right hon. Gentleman and his noble chief were conscious that there was something slightly absurd in the Act coming into operation on the 1st of April, and that the coming into operation of the Act was wisely put off for a day in order that it should not be said in this House that the Act had been designedly started on All Fools' Day, because the conduct of the Education Department under the Act would have led anybody to suppose that the British public and this House were being made complete fools of in regard to the expectations of last year. The article points out that last year we were told that directly the new Minister of Education was appointed we should have a real re-organisation of the Department, that there should be three secretaries—one for primary education, one for secondary education, and one for technical education; but nothing whatever has yet been done, and no sign has been given that anything is about to be done. In addition to that, according to the Act itself, a consultative committee of experts was to be appointed, and we were told that this committee was to be a most important body. We all imagined that my hon. friend the Member for Cambridge University would be immediately placed upon that body, and that by this time we should be receiving the great advantage of his experience and knowledge, and perhaps that of the recently-elected Member for London University. But that consultative committee appears to have been completely forgotten. Is it or is it not intended to do something in this matter; and, if so, what and when? There is also another point. We have had a new Code, and we have had a Minute with regard to higher grade schools. No doubt both these documents are interesting and important documents, but, as has been pointed out in all these discussions, we have been placed at a great disadvantage because we were told last year that there was to be a great system of education—primary, secondary, and technical—and that when the Bill of last session became an Act we were to be allowed to consider the whole of this question together on one great and comprehensive scale. What has become of the Secondary Education Bill? The question is intimately connected with the Vote we are discussing to-night; it is still more intimately connected with the Minute in regard to higher grade schools. This Bill hangs fire from week to week and from month to month. We are told that the Bill is to be introduced either here or in another place. When is it going to be introduced? In every county in England, in every place, in every society, in every assembly where education is discussed, the cry goes up, "When is this Secondary Education Bill going to be introduced?" There are numbers of most useful schemes at this moment hung up simply and solely because people are not informed as to what is going to happen in regard to secondary education. The hon. Member opposite expressed a strong opinion in favour of having a county authority. I entirely agree with him. I have always regretted we were not able to obtain in 1896 the clause which dealt with the formation of county authorities. There were many objectionable things in that Bill, but I almost think I would have swallowed them all if we had been able to get the county authorities. I still hope we shall get the county authorities, and I want to know whether we are to be told anything this session in regard to this important matter. I would venture to press the question still further, and to ask whether there is any serious intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government, even if they introduce this measure, to pass it into law. It is a matter of injustice to the whole teaching profession and to the educational authorities of this country, and it is hardly respectful to this House that a promise of a great measure of this kind should be dangled before them from week to week and from month to month while at the same time nothing is done to redeem that promise. I do not think the Committee will be satisfied to be told that this is a matter for the noble Duke the President of the Council. This is the House which votes the money for education, and we are entitled to know what the intentions of the Government are. The Government have mentioned this matter in the Queen's Speech, and when a Bill is promised in the Queen's Speech the House is seized of the promise, and has a right to ask for its redemption, or, if it is not redeemed, to know why. I earnestly trust the right hon. Gentleman will be able to allay the apprehensions which undoubtedly do exist that the House is being played with upon this question, and to remove the feeling that we shall probably separate, perhaps never to meet again in this Parliament, without the fulfilment of this great promise in regard to secondary education—a promise which at the commencement of this Parliament, and at the General Election which preceded this Parliament, was dangled before the electors of the country, and had no small share in placing the right hon. Gentleman opposite in the position he holds to-night.

*MR. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham, N.): Though I am a very young Member of the House, it has been my pleasure to hear the Educational Estimates introduced very frequently during the last twenty years. It was the practice of former Vice-Presidents to keep back the statistics referring to the education of the country until the debate took place, and then to give a few extracts from them, something in this style:—"That whereas the percentage of attendance in the schools during the past year was 87·4, it is this year 87·6; and although the progress has not been very marked, yet it is in the right direction, and the House may therefore be satisfied. That the number of children has increased by some few hundreds in the year, which is a further evidence of progress." And so the old practice went on year after year; Vice-President succeeded Vice-President in giving us these trifling statistical details, and I think that these methods did a very great deal of harm in the country; they lulled the people to sleep; the people thought the condition of our elementary schools was satisfactory; they pressed but few reforms upon the Education Department. But my right hon. friend has initiated a different form of procedure. I do not know whether it is because he loves being in a scrape. He told us during his statement this evening that he got into a great scrape recently for a statement he made, and I am inclined to think he will get into several more for some of the statements he has made to-night. But I believe he enjoys that kind of thing. At all events, he has succeeded in placing before the country some few truths which are not very pleasant to listen to, but facts which it is well the country should know; and though the right hon. Gentleman will be subjected to a large amount of criticism in regard to some of his statements, yet it is better we should have criticism than the lethargy and apathy which marked previous years. I admit I am often puzzled when the right hon. Gentleman is speaking. I have a shrewd suspicion that it is not always a departmental speech he is making. There are often indications that he is making a strong attack upon his own Department, and certainly he does not always appear to be cordially supporting the present Government. I am therefore sometimes a little puzzled as to the goal he is seeking and the object he has in view. If it be that from the knowledge he has gained in the Department and from the sympathy he has with child life he is trying to arouse that public opinion before which even the strongest Government must bow, I think the right hon. Gentleman is engaged in a good work, no matter how strange the procedure may at first sight appear. I believe he has done much during the last five years to arouse public opinion in regard to our schools, and I believe he himself would be surprised if he had the opportunities some of us have of ascertaining the great change which is taking place in public opinion outside this House on the question of the schools. If the next General Election be not completely overshadowed by one important topic, I shall not be surprised if this question of the schools plays a very large part in returning the next House of Commons. Many of the moderate men are sick and tired of these perpetual religious squabbles, and are heartily disgusted with the fanatics on both sides—with the Non-conformist who sees nothing but proselytising in the Church schools, and of the Churchman who sees everything that is godless in the Board schools. They cry out, "A plague on both your houses! Stand aside, and let the more moderate men of the country settle this question once for all, and give us a unified system of national education." It is significant that the debate initiated by the hon. Gentleman opposite collapsed almost instantly, and I am not going to trespass on the indulgence of the House by attempting to continue it. There are points mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman which I should like to emphasise. He has taken up an entirely new topic to-night, one that has been left alone for too many years—namely, the system of teaching in our infant schools. Children from three to seven or eight years of age are systematically crammed. The notion among managers, both Board and Voluntary, teachers, and the Department itself, until within recent years, was that the great object of school work was to impart information rather than to develop intelligence. I recollect going into a large school at Munich a few years ago, and, noticing the early hour at which the junior department came and the late hour at which they left, I remarked, "Do these children work all this number of hours?" and the directress of the department said, "Work? They never work." "Then what do they do all day?" I asked. "They play all day." The Germans in their infant departments realise the force of Montaigne's dictum that the games of the children are their most serious occupations. Now that the Department is breaking the fetters from off the teachers and setting them free, I do urge the Vice-President of the Council to see that the system they have destroyed is not reset up by school boards and by the Associations of Voluntary Schools. In the early days when the inspector went round to every school and dug up every tender plant to see how it was getting on, and then pushed it back into the soil again, grants depended upon those examinations, and the school managers having a keener eye to grants than to education, employed an inspector to go round in order to put the children through their facings before Her Majesty's inspector arrived. This used to be a sort of dress rehearsal. Now the Board of Education have declared the play itself to be injurious, but they still allow the dress rehearsal to go on. No one can tell the amount of mischief this practice is causing throughout the country. I have here the syllabus, or teachers' work-book, which is adopted by the Leeds School Board, which one would have thought was an enlightened and progressive authority. This work-book, which is to be filled up by the teacher, maps out every single subject to be taken in the babies' class, and every subject is split up into its separate divisions. These infants are inspected, and I remember a school where the inspector reported that the mental arithmetic of the lower babies was defective. I have a bundle of such reports which apply not to our much abused Voluntary school managers, but to one of your largest school boards which sends round its inspectors to the infant schools, and this is their conception of what the education of infants should be. In one of the schools to which I allude there was a report issued to the effect that good progress in handwriting was being made by the children of three years of age. There was also a report in one district to the effect that the pronunciation of the babies was defective. Conversational lessons, kindergarten, drawing, conversation, and scripture each had a separate report by this Board's inspector in the babies' class under the Leeds School Board. That is the system which is allowed to go on in Leeds. But what is the object of the change made by the Board of Education? Following the example of Continental countries very slowly, the Board of Education have concluded that this continual examination of the young child hinders its progress. What happened? When an inspector arrived your timid child always failed, and the courageous little mite who did not care a brass farthing for the inspector—although he might be the worst in the class—passed all right, and got the Government grant, while the timid and delicate little one failed. Looking at the question all round the Board considered that the individual examination of the children prevented the best methods being employed, and the teacher became an artisan instead of an artist. Teachers looked for grants and results instead of to education and the happiness which it might bring to the children. The Board of Education have now destroyed this absurd system, and they test the value of education given by the methods employed by the teachers. Now the Board ask, "Have you a competent teacher; are the methods you are employing thorough, sound, and educational; and are you as well equipped as the German and Swiss schools are with educational plant? If so, then the children are bound to make satisfactory progress." But while the Board of Education have thrown the old system aside themselves they are still permitting it by school boards and Voluntary school managers.

SIR J. GORST: No, no!

*MR. ERNEST GRAY: The right hon. Gentleman dissents from this, but will he tell us what he has done to stop this system? Have the inspectors been instructed to advise Boards to avoid this folly? Have the Associations of Voluntary Schools had it pointed out to them by any of Her Majesty's Inspectors what the result of this continual inspection of young children will be? For many years the Association of Voluntary Schools have employed organising masters as inspectors under another name. Of late years they have increased the number of these masters and given them more detailed work. The explanation is very simple because the Act will not allow these associations to expend money on secretarial work, and so they resort to the very simple expedient of making the secretary to the Board the organising master also. That sort of thing goes on in diocese after diocese. The inspector has to justify his existence and in some cases he goes round to school after school and undertakes this detailed examination. I have a report from one of these inspectors in the south of England, which covers six pages of foolscap. I do hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President of the Council will not content himself by simply making eloquent addresses, but will go back to Whitehall and see that the principles he professes here are put into practice. If he cannot do this then let him come back here and tell us who is hindering these reforms. Above the kindergarten must come the popular school, and above that the higher elementary school and the technical institute, and for a very few indeed the higher schools and afterwards the University. But the foundation of all this will be your kindergarten system. When the private schools have disappeared and we are able to adapt ourselves to conditions such as prevail under a German system we may hope to see the kindergarten the real foundation of all intellectual educational work in this country. I wish some of those who look with suspicion upon the amount of money we are expending upon education and who talk about religious difficulties and nonsense of that sort, could go and spend a week in one of the great educational establishments of Zurich and Geneva and see what is being done all up and down the provinces abroad. There every person rich or poor sends his child off to the kindergarten school where the children get the foundation for the work of the higher schools. After this they realise that their course is clear right on to the University. But in those countries they get their children to attend regularly at school. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President referred to this point for a moment, but he might have spent a little more time in raising this great question. You may have the very best system of school management and the very best teachers, but you cannot get the best results unless the children attend regularly. What is the case in England? I intend to refer to this question again on account of a most remarkable statement which was made by the Lord President of the Council. The right hon. Gentleman made a speech in which he stated that in our English elementary schools we had an average attendance of 82 per cent.—that is, according to the returns, out of every 100 children no less a total than 18 are absent every day. The Duke of Devonshire stated that these figures were very misleading, and that they must not be accepted as an accurate record of the position. He went on to point out that a true estimate should be founded upon the number of avoidable absentees, and that from this total of eighteen you must eliminate all children who are ill and those who are absent owing to domestic trouble, and so on. What conclusion did the Duke of Devonshire arrive at? After taking these considerations into account he concluded that, instead of eighteen out of every 100 being absent, there were only about 6 per cent. absent through avoidable causes. I challenge the Vice-President of the Council to produce the evidence upon which that statement is founded. Let us have the figures before us. It is the universal experience of everybody familiar with the management of the schools of England that that figure is altogether inaccurate and altogether wrong. That statement is founded upon the assumption that the 18 per cent. of irregular children are evenly distributed all over the country. That is an entire fallacy. I was in Abergavenny the other day, and there I found that the average attendance of the children was something like 72 per cent., and how can you carry on your education successfully under circumstances like that? Your labour and your money might just as well be thrown into the gutter. You are starting and building your schools now upon the assumption that you will have 94 per cent. present. Now you have in Wales 25 per cent. of the children away from school every day. The figures are not even throughout the country. In some counties it is possible to obtain an attendance of 87 or 88 per cent., but in other counties it sinks down so low as 72 and 73 per cent. But what is the Vice-President of the Council doing in this matter? He deplores this again and again in his speeches, which upon this subject leave nothing to be desired. He has said that he would press it upon parents and local authorities that something should be done to get the children to attend school more regularly, but what is he doing? There is active hostility to this on the part of some parents, school attendance committees, and small school boards. Some 2,400 school boards exist, but my opinion is that we could do comfortably without 2,000 of them. Many of these small school boards are composed of five members, who possess but the barest conception of their duties. Some of them actually employ the children who ought to be in the school. Some of these school attendance committees meet every two months, and it is their duty to appoint an officer to look after these irregular children. Go down into South Wales, and you will find that the man who collects the tolls is appointed by the board to look after the children who do not attend regularly. In some cases the officer employed is paid £2 per annum for performing this duty. What does my right hon. friend do with these school boards? I have begged of him to appoint inspectors of attendance who would go round and see how these authorities are discharging their duty, but I have not yet heard if he is prepared to do that. The Blue-books are full of laments from the inspectors that they cannot get the children to attend school. And yet the school attendance committees and defaulting school boards are not compelled to carry out the law. My right hon. friend will perhaps reply that we have a Bill before the House which will remedy this, but very little progress is being made with that measure, and I begin to fear that that little Bill may be lost to us, and that this state of things will continue. I must apologise for touching upon this subject again. I almost regret having to bring questions of this detailed character before the Committee, but if hon. Members could realise as I do how the work of the school is hindered, and the amount of mischief which is caused by this irregular attendance of the children, then they would not be surprised at my anxiety that this subject should be pressed home. It is not merely that the children who are absent lose the benefit of the instruction, but they also do an immense amount of mischief to the children who do come regularly to school. If the Board of Education take a decided policy on this question I am sure the great majority of parents would support them. With the indulgence of the Committee I desire to refer to one other question. I venture to endorse the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President that if you want a proper system which will work successfully in your schools you must have the children attending regularly. On the other hand if you want to induce the parents of this country to send their children regularly to school there must be the assurance that when they are there they will be properly taught. Many of the working classes deny themselves, and have to pinch and economise in order that their children shall go to school. No one knows this better than the hon. Members who represent factory districts. If we force parents to send their children to school it is our duty to see that those children are properly educated. I do not think that even the right hon. Gentleman will contend that all our teachers are properly qualified for this work. So long as you allow nearly one-half of the children of this country to be taught by mere boys and girls, who are nothing but apprentices; so long as you allow some 17,000 young women, with no other qualification but the age of eighteen and vaccination, to teach, or pretend to teach, in your schools, you are hardly justified in compelling every parent to send his children into such schools. Such a state of things is a fraud upon the parents. It is robbing the children of part of their education, wasting public money, and failing in our duty to the people to allow such utterly incompetent persons in our schools. It is ridiculous to talk about such persons teaching, for they cannot teach. It must have been one of these teachers who said that the hare was another name for a rabbit. I once heard of a teacher who told the children that Cinderella was the first Queen of England. I have seen the handwriting of some of these teachers, and they have not the ghost of a notion of how to write a letter. Some of them have been housemaids, and others have become tired of the needle. Therefore they are of the cheap and nasty order, and this is money thrown away. Of course the inspector has to approve of them, but it is simply a case of Hobson's choice. If he does not take that article he has nothing else. I am sorry to say that by far the great majority of these incompetent teachers are in the Voluntary schools. And why? Certainly not with the free will of those who employ them. It is simply because the funds are not sufficient to allow them to put a decent staff into every school. About 2,000 of these teachers are in board schools. Under the London School Board the young person of the age of eighteen as a teacher is absolutely unknown. Under the London School Board 81 per cent. are trained certificated teachers who are properly qualified, and only 4 per cent. are uncertificated adults, and they do not employ a single one of those incompetent teachers. In the county of Monmouth, instead of 81 per cent. as under the London School Board, only 26 per cent. are certificated teachers, and no less than 30 per cent. are uncertificated assistants. No less than 29 per cent., or nearly one-third, of the teachers in the Board and Voluntary schools in the county of Monmouth are apprentices who would not be admitted into a Swiss school. In Cologne they tried our system thirty years ago, but they found it was bad and they got rid of it, and until the teachers are properly trained they are not now allowed to practise upon the children. In the county of Monmouth no less than 15 per cent. of the teachers come under Article 68. What is the Vice-President's Department doing to see that these schools are properly staffed? His reply, I am afraid, will be that a year ago they made some attempt to improve the conditions and limit the number of these teachers, but the House of Commons thought differently. I suppose that one must not criticise a vote given in the House of Commons, but I do wish that the right hon. Gentleman would try another experiment, and come down to the House again and tell us clearly what is necessary for the sound education of the children, and if he fails to get the support of the House he should throw himself upon the country to see whether the people will support him or not. I do not believe that the vote given in this House truly represented the state of the feeling outside. I feel confident that the people of this country wish their children to be well taught, and that the school managers would employ competent teachers if they had the money. We want proper control and management and the necessary funds to carry out this object. At Oxford some French friends of mine asked me why we employed these pupil teachers if they were so bad, and what answer could I give? Simply that England was too poor to give better grants. Is England too poor to support its schools? The battles of the future will be fought between the intellect of nations, and the nation will win those struggles which best fits out its schools and which relies most upon the equipment of its young children. England, I am afraid, is resting satisfied upon what it has accomplished, and I hope the Vice-President's speech will do something to remove some of that apathy. It is not a question merely of the training of the children, and it is not a domestic matter. I am not pleading simply on behalf of the child or the working man's home, but the question is one of infinitely greater importance. The question is whether the electorate of a few years hence who will have to build up this House and control the destinies of the Empire, will be a wise and understanding people. They may be if the Board of Education will secure for them these reforms, but I am certain that if we go muddling along in our schools in the way which has characterised our policy during the last twenty-five years, we have nothing to look forward to but defeat at the hands of the Germans, and in some trades at the hands of the Swiss, and also an ignorant electorate, than which there could be no greater disaster to our country.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, etc.): The speech delivered by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down does a great injustice, perhaps rather unintentionally, to my part of the country. He has held Wales up as the one part of Great Britain where the attendance is execrable. I am sure the hon. Member for North-west Ham does not wish to be unfair to Wales, but it is exceedingly difficult for children of a tender age to attend school in some parts of Wales. In a mountainous country the hon. Member must know that it is difficult to send a child five years of age some four or five miles to the nearest school. Therefore the hon. Member cannot fairly compare the attendance in a mountainous district with the attendance in other counties in this country. It is a gross piece of unfairness, and I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has (not for the first time) been guilty of it. As a Welsh Member I thank the Vice-President for his references to the efforts which Wales is making to improve its educational system. He spoke of them in very eulogistic terms, and yet the hon. Member for North-west Ham lectures the Welsh community on their own educational system, which they understand considerably better than he does. The hon. Gentleman was very severe on those who complain of the grievances under which Nonconformists in this country suffer as regards educational matters. I observed that the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich, although I would not for one moment suggest that he has any excessive sympathy with Nonconformists, admitted the grievance. Other hon. Members opposite also admitted it, and it was reserved to the hon. Member for North-west Ham to get up and talk about the grievances of Nonconformist children, to quote his own words, as "nonsense." But I may point out to him that his own speech was a complete refutation of that accusation. The hon. Gentleman also, referring to the motion of my hon. friend the Member for Flintshire, in respect to which my hon. friend is the spokesman of millions of people in this country, said that it was all nonsense and that there was no such grievance.

*MR. GRAY: I did not describe religion as nonsense, but the platform religious difficulty as nonsense.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The words of the hon. Gentleman were that the religious difficulty in schools was all nonsense, and yet his own speech offers a complete refutation of that statement. What is one of his own complaints with regard to the educational system? It is that Article 68 teachers are a necessity in the Voluntary schools because the schools have no funds to pay better teachers. How is it that they have no funds? It is true that they have a large grant from Imperial sources, but they cannot supplement it by local aid. Does the hon. Gentleman mean to suggest that they can get local aid to place Voluntary schools on the same footing as Board schools without giving local control? And if local control is given then the religious difficulty disappears. Take some of the parishes referred to over and over again to-night, where the bulk of the population is Nonconformist, and where the only State school is under the control of the minister of another denomination. What would happen if local rates were summoned to the aid of that school? You would have local representatives on the committee of management, and the school would cease to be a sectarian school, and would become a parochial school under a committee of management representing the bulk of the ratepayers. Does not that mean that the religious difficulty is at the root of the whole business? [Mr. GRAY dissented.] The hon. Member shakes his head. Can he point out to me how he is going to raise this fund without getting local control?

*MR. GRAY: Yes. In the case of Evangelical and Roman Catholic schools in some of the towns of Western Germany, which give the religious education the parents require, no religious difficulty arises.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: In Catholic districts in Germany there are Catholic schools, but that is because the bulk of the ratepayers are Catholics. In other districts there are Protestant schools, because the bulk of the ratepayers are Protestants.

*MR. GRAY: You have them both side by side.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: But if you have them both side by side there is also a committee of management. I challenge the hon. Gentleman to give a single case on the Continent where a Catholic school in a district is the only school and where the majority of the people are Protestants.

*MR. GRAY: Oh, yes, there would be no difficulty in proving that. I cannot give a case where there is only one school, but it is perfectly possible to have an authority managing the whole education of an area, and under that authority you can have a Roman Catholic school and a Protestant school in each of which the religion required by the parents is given. I have seen it done, and such people laugh at the religious difficulty and know it is non-existent.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: So well they might laugh, because it is a totally different system from the system in this country. The hon. Gentleman is evading the point. I am giving a case where the only State school is managed by a clergyman representing the minority of the population, the bulk of the population being Nonconformist. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that there is no similar case to be found on the Continent.

*MR. GRAY: Oh, yes; there are dozens of them in Belgium.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: It is perfectly true that there is a grievance in some parts of Belgium, but in the vast majority of cases there the population is Roman Catholic and there is no large Protestant minority. I do not think there is a single case where the majority of the people being Protestants the school is managed by a priest of the Catholic Church. In Switzerland the teachers are appointed by a committee representing the ratepayers in the district, and yet the hon. Member quotes Switzerland as a country where no religious difficulty exists. Nor would there here if we followed the Swiss system. Let me take another case as showing that the religious difficulty is at the bottom of our educational trouble. What happens in regard to the training colleges? I find there are six undenominational training colleges which have 294 vacancies. But there were 511 applicants who passed in the first class, which meant that there were 217 applicants who had passed in the first class who were excluded from these colleges for want of room. What happens in the denominational colleges? They have more vacancies than can be supplied out of the first class, and those vacancies have to be made up, not out of the 217 applicants who had passed the first class and were excluded from the undenominational colleges, but out of second-class and sometimes third-class candidates who were willing to take denominational tests. That means that 217 teachers who had passed in the first class are excluded from the teaching profession for the benefit of teachers of second or third rate ability, simply because the training colleges have got denominational and sectarian tests. And yet in face of these facts the hon. Gentleman says that the religious difficulty is nonsense. The religious difficulty is at the root of all our trouble. The hon. Member talks of England being poor, when she is spending 200 million pounds in war and in preparation for war. England is not too poor to expend money on education. The difficulty has been pointed out by the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich in his exceedingly candid speech. It is that we have got two hostile systems in this country, each watching the other and barring the way. The hon. Member knows as well as and probably better than most hon. Members that it is part of the policy of the friends of the Voluntary schools in most districts to keep down expenditure on the education in Board schools. It is a kind of economy, but it is not brought forward for purposes of economy. They do not want money expended on the Board schools because they do not want the Board School system to spread. What is the effect on the Voluntary schools? I have voted against every proposal to give the Voluntary schools a single penny unless it is accompanied by local control. The friends of the Voluntary schools vote against money being given to the Board schools, and we thus have two hostile systems entwined as it were in this country. This is a state of affairs that ought to be put an end to, and I was very glad to hear the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich as to an agreement between the two parties. I am afraid it is impossible in this country to do away altogether with all sectarian teaching, but I am perfectly certain that, if the friends of both systems were to meet there might be a way out of the difficulty. There was one thing the noble Lord said which I was rather sorry for. He said very frankly that he admitted the grievance of the Nonconformists, but he said practically that as long as they inflicted a grievance in certain districts on the other side their own grievance would be continued. That did not strike me as a very Christian principle, or one that should be put forward in the interests of religious education. The grievance is undoubted. What we complain of is this—and it is the principal grievance of Nonconformists—that in about 8,000 parishes of England and Wales the children of Nonconformists are excluded from the teaching profession. The First Lord of the Treasury did deny that, but I think, if he will allow me to say so, he has not gone very much into the question.

LORD HUGH CECIL: The children are obliged to be taught the religious opinions of their parents.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not think that is so much the grievance. The grievance of the Nonconformist parent is first of all that he has nothing at all to do with the control of the public school. He may have control of the parish pump, but he has no voice whatever as to the education of his children; and the other grievance is that his children are excluded from the teaching profession except on the condition that they attend the services of the Church of England. That is an undoubted grievance. I know the Vice-President will deny it.

SIR J. GORST: Oh, no! I said it was a most excellent theoretical grievance.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I will give a case in point, and ask the Committee if it is a theoretical grievance. The Wesleyan Conference went into the matter very fully, and they found that out of 980 schools, practically the only State schools in their districts, and under the management of the Church of England, tests were imposed in no less than 890 cases.

SIR J. GORST: Did they find any single case in which a Wesleyan child was prevented from becoming a pupil teacher by belonging to that sect?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Yes, they did. I have got a case here which happened in the west of England. But even if that were not so, the right hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a fair way to put it. Suppose we find that the majority of children in a given school are Dissenters, and that in that school no Dissenters have ever been allowed to become teachers. It is perfectly true that we cannot prove that the schoolmaster went to such and such a boy or girl and said, "Unless you become a member of the Church of England I cannot entertain your application to become a pupil teacher." But if you get 800 parishes where the bulk of the children are Wesleyan and you find that no Wesleyan has ever been a teacher, it is perfectly fair to draw the inference that the test is imposed in such cases. I know from personal observation, as does every hon. Member that represents a Nonconformist constituency, that there are tens of parishes where the children are in the main Nonconformists, but in which no Nonconformist has ever been known to become a pupil teacher within the memory of man. That is the experience in my own constituency, with one or two exceptions; and although you cannot prove that such and such a boy was deterred from entering on the teaching profession because he was a Nonconformist, is it not fair to infer, if you draw all your teachers from the sect to which the clergyman who manages the school belongs, and not from the denomination to which the children belong, that tests are imposed? These are schools for the purpose of teaching children the doctrines of the Church of England, and I think it is perfectly right as long as this system remains in existence that children belonging to a particular Church should be taught by teachers who are members of that Church. There is nothing at all in that which any clergyman may disavow. But this is the real test which I have asked the right hon. Gentleman over and over again to consent to. Will he consent to a Return of all the teachers in Voluntary schools who are members of any other denomination except the Church of England? This is a real and very substantial grievance. Every religious denomination in the kingdom has petitioned the Board of Education to remove it. The noble Lord the Member for Greenwich frankly and honestly admits it, and the Vice-President of the Council is alone in saying that it is a purely paper grievance. I ask him to put it to the test by granting the Return I have asked for over and over again, and if he does he will see that it is a very substantial grievance and ought to be removed.

SIR J. GORST: I will now proceed to answer the various questions put to me, but I will not answer the question put by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, because I answered it a few weeks ago when the hon. Gentleman made exactly the same speech, and I told him then that it was quite impossible for the Education Department to make an inquisitorial search into the religious opinions of teachers. I not only said that a few weeks ago, but I said the same thing on many other occasions when the same question was put to me during the five years that I have been at the Education Department. It is the officials of the Education Department who protest against a precedent being set for an inquiry by them into the religious opinions of the teachers. Now in the first place my hon. friend the Member for East Somerset asked me a great number of questions about the secondary education branch of the Board of Education. The Act of last session only imposed on the new Board of Education with reference to secondary education two functions. One was to undertake certain powers of the Charity Commissioners transferred by Order in Council, and the other was to inspect such of the secondary schools as asked for inspection. The Order in Council transferring the powers of the Charity Commissioners is now on the Table of the House, and if the House assents to it it will come into force on the 1st of November next, so that there is still ample time for the Board of Education to make the necessary arrangements. With regard to the inspection of secondary schools, I am informed that very few secondary schools have up to the present applied to the Board of Education to be inspected—not more than about a dozen. Most of them are making inquiries as to the conditions of inspection, and therefore it is rather premature to find fault with the Board of Education, because all these matters are not now before the Committee. With regard to the organisation of the Department I can only give my hon. friend the answer which I gave a few weeks ago, and that is that the matter is still under the consideration of the President of the Board of Education, and that he hopes shortly in another place to make an announcement on the subject. My hon. friend asked me some questions as to the draft Order in Council which is before the Committee. Undoubtedly the powers according to the text of that Order will be concurrently exercised by the Charity Commissioners and the Board of Education; but an arrangement has been made between the Departments which will prevent any overlapping, and there is a distinct arrangement between them as to what powers should be exercised by each.

SIR F. S. POWELL: Can the right hon. Gentleman state to whom a communication should be addressed?

SIR J. GORST: I think communications should be addressed to the Secretary to the Board of Education after this Order comes into force. My hon. friend also asked me why the transfer of certain powers is restricted to Wales. The answer is that the case of Wales is rather more urgent than that of England, because in Wales an Intermediate Education Act is in force, and it is more important that secondary education powers should be applied earlier there. We have no intermediate education at the present moment in England, and the expectation is that the experience derived from the administration of these powers in Wales will guide the Board of Education in the transfer of further powers to England. The third point to which my hon. friend referred was that there was no transfer of powers in connection with the Board of Agriculture. There is, however, no occasion for that, because all the powers of the Board of Agriculture are exercised by the Board of Education already. The fact is that the Board of Agriculture does nothing either in primary or secondary schools: its function at present is confined to making certain grants to agricultural colleges. With regard to the observations of my hon. friend as to continuation schools, I entirely agree. I think it is most desirable that the administration of the grants to evening continuation schools in rural districts should be exercised by the county council, and should be managed by the secondary education branch of the Board of Education. That, of course, is a matter which will require some consideration. It is now under the consideration of the Board of Education, and I hope that before very long an arrangement will be made satisfactory to my hon. friend. My hon. friend the Member for Wigan also asked me about Clause 7. The announcement of the intention of the Government to establish secondary educational authorities has, of course, put an end to the voluntary arrangements under that clause. Twenty-eight out of forty-nine administrative counties have formed committees under Section 7, and fifteen out of sixty-one county boroughs. The hon. Member for the Hoxton Division and other hon. Members spoke about poor law children. I entirely agree with my hon. friend the Member for West Bradford that the real solution of the difficulty is that all poor law children should be sent to ordinary elementary schools. There is now no difficulty whatever about it. The plan was invented in Sheffield, and it has now been adopted in several counties as well as in large towns. The children, instead of being taken into the workhouses, are boarded out in houses scattered in various parts of the town or district in small numbers, twelve or so in each house, and from these houses they attend a public elementary school—Board or Voluntary—and mix with the ordinary children. They mix with the ordinary children of the town and are as much as possible dissociated from all connection with the workhouse. In other places there is nothing to prevent the children living in the workhouse and attending elementary schools; and although life in the workhouse is very bad for them, it is very much mitigated by their attending the elementary schools. I remember myself being present at the Poplar workhouse when something approaching 200 of these children, who were living in the workhouse, came in from attendance at the elementary schools where they had been receiving their education. The only cases to which the remarks of the hon. Member apply are what are called the large boarding schools. I must confess that these large boarding schools are very bad institutions, and the sooner they are done away with the better. I have no desire to give a kind of testimonial from the Education Department to the efficiency of these schools by undertaking a sham examination of the mere elementary instruction which is given in them. I quite agree with what the hon. Member for Hoxton said, that it is a very great misfortune that the children of the country are not all under one Department. Some are under the Poor Law Board, and some under the Home Office. My private opinion is that that is a very bad arrangement. Those under the Poor Law Board get the workhouse taint, and those under the Home Office get a kind of prison taint. It would be very much better if all the children of the country were placed under the charge of one Department. If that cannot be done, it seems to me it would be a very unfortunate arrangement if you were to establish in these schools, which I trust are fast disappearing, a kind of double authority; because if you had the Local Government Board giving instructions in respect to these children in one direction and the Education Department in another, you must inevitably have friction between the two Departments. In fact this arrangement, which formerly prevailed, was cancelled in 1863, and it would be very inadvisable to revive a system already tried and found wanting. The hon. Baronet the Member for North Norfolk and the hon. Member for Rossendale both expressed apprehension that my remarks applied to the kind of infants' schools in which they were interested; but these were not the schools to which my earlier remarks were directed. That sort of infants' schools are highly to be commended, and they might be extended throughout the country with advantage. My remarks applied to the common type of infants' schools in this country described by the hon. Member for North-west Ham, where infants at the tender age of three are drilled in reading, writing, and arithmetic—a proceeding to which I object as much as the hon. Member. I have seen infants' schools in which the children really play, and where their brains are not cruelly exercised. There is one I know very well in the South of London where the children are employed in making what we in our younger days would have called mud pies, but what is now called clay modelling. In this school, which is presided over by a lady who I suppose has been trained under the kindergarten system, the reading, writing, and arithmetic are relegated into the background. The children are hardly taught at all; but they are taught clay modelling, drawing, and colouring with water, and the results are most extraordinary. The children are delighted, but they never read or write, and never do mental arithmetic. It is said by the inspectors that when these children are turned out of these infants' schools into schools for higher children, they are better readers and writers and even better arithmeticians than the children who had been drilled in schools where their little brains were exercised prematurely. I hope the remarks I made about infants' schools will not be misunderstood. I most highly appreciate schools of that kind; but what I want is to get the country to realise that many of these children are put into schools where they do not play, and where their poor little brains are exercised prematurely, with great disadvantage to the infants. The hon. Member for Rossendale, I think, was very unreasonable in complaining that the higher elementary schools had not been already established. The Minute was only laid on the Table just before we adjourned for the Whitsuntide holidays. The hon. Member must give the Department a little time. Applications have already been received for a number of these schools, and I have no doubt that some arrangement will be made for establishing such schools after the vacations. A question has been asked by the noble Lord the Member for Cricklade as to when the Secondary Education Bill will be introduced. I understand that it will be introduced shortly in another place, but the exact day I am unable to fix. The only other point to which I need refer is the question of dismissal of teachers. That question has been forced on the attention of the Government by a great number of speakers on both sides of the House. I must frankly admit that I think it will be necessary, will be inevitable, after the passing of the Act by which pensions are given to teachers, to bring in some measure to prevent their unreasonable and improper dismissal. I think the Education Department has a right to do this, because, as has been said by some of the speakers, those who pay the piper have a right to call the tune, and the Education Department does pay the greater part of the teachers' salaries. Therefore, I think they have a reasonable right to have a voice, at least, in the dismissal of the teachers. I do not think, however, that the question needs legislation; it can be done by means of a Minute. There is no impossibility in making such an arrangement as that without constituting the Education Department a Court of Appeal in every possible case, which would be quite impracticable. I think there would be no difficulty in obliging managers, whenever they dismissed a teacher, to give a written statement of the ground on which that dismissal has taken place, leaving to the Education Department the right of saying whether that ground was reasonable or not. I have expressed my own opinion about the question; I might have gone further and said that it would be considered by the Department, if I was not afraid of the hon. Member for West Nottingham. I understand that the theory of the hon. Member for West Nottingham is that no physician has any right to diagnose any disease until he is prepared to effect an immediate cure. I undertake, however, that when the Code to be introduced next year is considered, this matter also will be considered, and that I will represent what has been said to-day to my noble friend the President. I hope that the wisdom of the new Board of Education will be able to find out a solution of the difficulty, so that teachers will have reasonable security that no rash and capricious dismissal should deprive them of the advantage of the pension they have earned, and the security of their position to which they are entitled.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): At this hour of the evening I wish to confine my observations to a few points which have arisen in the debate, and especially to that last mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, the tenure of the teacher's office, and the right of appeal against capricious dismissal. I think that the debate this evening has satisfied the Vice-President—indeed, I gathered from his speech that he admits that there is little or no difference of opinion on this subject. I was extremely glad to hear him give the assurance, which we may take practically as a promise, that this matter will be dealt with in the Code. It is a matter of the highest importance to the teaching profession, not only because it is a corollary to the granting of pensions, but because it tends very much to increase the credit and standing of the teaching profession. One of the best means by which to induce men of superior character and ability to become teachers is to give an assurance that they will not be subject to arbitrary dismissal hereafter. I would like to add, although I do not see the Lord Advocate present, that this is a question which has attracted a great deal of attention in Scotland, and I hope that what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman will be taken notice of by the Scotch Office, and that some similar provision will be made for Scotland as the right hon. Gentleman has promised for England. Another point to which I wish to refer is in regard to the training colleges. I do not think there is any desire to press the right hon. the Vice-President too far in relation to the hope he has held out in regard to these colleges, but we were glad to hear him speak to-night of the necessity of having more day training colleges. Residential colleges have rather a tendency to induce an ultra-professional and mechanical quality, and the cultivation of a certain set of ideas, as is not unnatural to men brought up entirely in a sort of seminary, and not moving in the larger intellectual and professional world. From these disadvantages day colleges are more free. Now, both the older universities and colleges have opened facilities for students who come from the outside to receive the best kind of teaching. That has been of great benefit; it has tended to raise the standard of the profession, and to diminish the chasm which used to yawn between the elementary and secondary teachers. The elementary teachers who come to the university feel themselves brought within the range and scope of the profession, and into closer touch with those who are trained for the secondary schools. These are considerable advantages, and I do not think the new Board of Education could do anything better than signalise its constitution by an advance in the direction of day training colleges. I hope we may take the words of the right hon. the Vice-President as more than a mere platonic expression of sympathy, and that he will proceed with steps by which the Board of Education will give effect to his ideas. If the right hon. Gentleman will only do so, I believe he will have the unanimous support of the House. Upon the other topics which have been raised to-night I will not enter, except one. I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he proposes to make known to the House, either by way of Minute or otherwise, the distribution of functions between the Charity Commissioners and the Board of Education. I understood him to say that under the new Order there would be concurrent powers, but that there is to be an arrangement by which some of these powers would be exercised by the Board of Education, and others exercised, as heretofore, by the Charity Commissioners. That is not an unreasonable arrangement, and certainly it would be to the advantage of those who have to deal with charities on the educational side. I do not suppose that an Order in Council will be necessary—in fact, it would be unsuitable—but there might be a Minute issued by the Education Department which might specify the different functions to be exercised by the Charity Commissioners and the Board of Education.

SIR J. GORST: The suggestion of my right hon. friend opposite is most valuable, and it will be considered.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD BILL [Lords].

As amended, considered.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I was under the impression that this Bill would have gone over in the ordinary way, as I had placed on the Paper notice of opposition.

*MR. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. Member rose to object it would not go over. Very frequently hon. Members place notices of motion on the Paper, but do not insist on them. Of course, if the hon. Member had risen, the Bill would have been postponed.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I was advised that the fact of putting a blocking notice on the Paper was sufficient to secure delay.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member was badly advised. But he will have the opportunity of raising the question on the Third Reading.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Thank you, Sir. I will reserve myself for that.

Bill to be read the third time.

ORDERS NOT COMPLIED WITH).

MR. SPEAKER laid upon the Table Report from one of the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, That, in the case of the Petition for the following Bill, the Standing Orders have not been complied with, viz. :—

RETURNS, REPORTS, ETC.

EXPERIMENTS ON LIVING ANIMALS.

Motion made, for an Address for "Return showing the number of Experiments performed on Living Animals during the year 1899 under Licences granted under the Act 39 and 40 Vic., c. 77, distinguishing Painless from Painful Experiments (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 215, of Session 1899)." — (Mr. Jesse Collings.)

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) said he had listened with very great regret to this motion being put from the Chair at so late a period of the session. It was very necessary, if this information was to be of any use, that the motion should be made earlier in the session. A year or two ago he ventured to put himself into communication with the Home Office, and he then secured an assurance that in future the motion should be made earlier in the session. As matters now stood it would be the middle of July before the Return was in the hands of hon. Members, and it would be practically useless for all purposes of discussion. He wished strongly to protest against the habit which had grown up in recent years of presenting this Return so late in the middle of June. There was no reason why it should not be presented before Easter. Many years had elapsed since the House discussed the administration of these Acts, and a further discussion would certainly be necessary when the House was able to give its attention to less exciting matters than those which had occupied it during the whole of the present session.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. JESSE COLLINGS, Birmingham, Bordesley): Attention was given to the representations of the hon. Member, and an effort was made to forward the preparation of the Return. I may tell the hon. Member that, though the motion is late, the Return is ready for the printer, and will, I hope, be issued in a week or ten days. Next session an effort shall be made to still further meet the hon. Member's wishes.

Motion agreed to.

TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANK.

Return ordered, "(1) from each Savings Bank in England and Wales, Scotland, Ireland, and the Channel Islands, containing, in columns, the names of the Officers, their respective salaries, and other allowances, if any; the amount of security each gives; the annual expenses of management, inclusive of all payments and salaries, for the year ended the 20th day of November, 1899; the rate per centum per annum on the capital of the bank for the expenses of management; the rate of interest paid to depositors on the various amounts of deposit, and the average rate of interest on all accounts; the number of accounts remaining open; the total amount owing to depositors; the total amount invested with the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt; the balance in the hands of the treasurer at the 20th day of November, 1899; the total amount of the separate surplus fund on the 20th day of November, 1899; other assets, including estimated value of bank premises, furniture, etc.; the total assets; the total amount of Government stock standing to the credit of depositors; the number and amount of annuities granted; and the average cost of each transaction; also the year in which business commenced in each bank, and the name of the day or days, and the number of hours in the week, on which the banks are open for the deposit and withdrawal of moneys; including in such a Return a list of all such savings banks as, under the provisions of the Act 26 Vic. c. 14, or otherwise, have been closed and have transferred their funds, or any part thereof, to the Post Office Savings Banks; showing, in each case, the number of such Banks, as well as the number and amount of depositors' accounts so transferred, and the amount of compensation, if any, made to all or any of the officers of such banks respectively, and showing also the years in which such banks were respectively opened and closed, and the number and amount of their depositors' balances, and the number of days and hours in each week on which the same banks were open for public business at the close of the year next preceding the date of such closing; distinguishing the same, as in the form of the Return, for each separate county, as well as collectively, for England and Wales, Scotland, Ireland, and the Channel Islands, and for the United Kingdom: and (2) for the year ending the 20th day of November, 1899, showing the total number of depositors in trustee savings banks; the total number of deposits; the average amount of each deposit account; the average sums paid in and drawn out; the total number of persons who have deposited in single sums the entire amount allowed to be deposited during the year (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 297, of Session 1899)."—(Sir John William Maclure.)

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—SIEGE OF LADYSMITH—DISAPPEARANCE OF STORES.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the War Office have received the proceedings in the courts-martial held on those concerned in the disappearance of stores at the hospital in Intombi Camp during the first two months of the siege of Ladysmith; and whether any further notice is to be taken of the matter.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The only court-martial proceedings that have reached the War Office answering the right hon. Member's description are those concerning a staff sergeant of the Indian Commissariat Department, acting as sub-conductor, who was found guilty of fraudulently misapplying public goods to his own use on the 6th and 7th February in Intombi Camp. He was reduced to the ranks and given six months imprisonment with hard labour.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: Has any report been received from Sir G. White?

LADYSMITH—SIR G. WHITE'S DESPATCHES.

MR. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if reports have been received from Sir George White on the siege of Ladysmith; and, if so, when will they be published.

*MR. WYNDHAM: As I have already told the House, I am not prepared to anticipate by way of question and answer any exercise which the Secretary of State for War may see fit to make of his discretion as to the publication of the despatches and reports on military operations.

MR. LAFONE: Although men who were shut up in Ladysmith have been home two months, we have yet no official information of what took place there.

ALLEGED CLAIM ON THE MAYOR OF LADYSMITH.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any information to the effect that a claim has been made by the Imperial Government on the Mayor of Ladysmith for food supplied during the siege from the military supplies for the maintenance of the inhabitants, many of whom had joined the fighting ranks.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I have no information.

ALLEGED OUTRAGES ON BOER FEMALES BY BRITISH TROOPS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether an English infantry patrol of twenty men, while raiding near Dundee, entered the farmhouses of the absent Boers and outraged their wives and children, and were surprised in the act by Republican soldiers, and some of them shot; whether, in another place, also near Dundee, a family of six females, named Bester, aged respectively forty-five, eighteen, fourteen, twelve, and two younger children, were outraged by men of an English patrol; and whether he has any official information of such occurrences to communicate; and, if not, whether he will cause inquiry to be made into these allegations.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No, Sir, we have no information. I understand that the allegations referred to are based upon the reported conversation of an officer serving in the Boer army, and I do not think that we should be justified in asking the generals in the field to investigate charges which rest upon such evidence. The crimes referred to, if committed on active service, would be punishable by death; and I am confident that the authorities in South Africa would require no instigation from us to investigate any charges of the kind.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: But in view of the fact that it is stated that three or four soldiers were caught in the act and shot, is it not worth while to inquire?

[No answer was given.]

JAMESON RAID INDEMNITY.

SIR BRAMPTON GURDON (Norfolk, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the indemnity which the Chartered Company of British South Africa undertook to pay on the release of the prisoners after the Jameson Raid has become the property of this country by right of conquest; and, if so, whether immediate steps will be taken to claim a reasonable sum from the Chartered Company on account of the said indemnity, with interest for the last four years, and to apply the same towards the expenses of the present war.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The claim to the indemnity would remain that of the Transvaal Government. It is premature to say now what action may be taken by Her Majesty's Government in the matter hereafter.

RESIGNATION OF THE CAPE MINISTRY.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can give the House any information with respect to the reported resignation of the Schreiner Ministry at the Cape.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am not in a position to say more than that Mr.

Schreiner and his colleagues have tendered their resignations to Sir A. Milner, and that they have been accepted.

ALDERSHOT MANŒUVRES — HEAT FATALITIES—ARMY CLOTHING.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the deaths and suffering of the troops at Aldershot during the recent review were caused by unsuitable headgear and want of proper food; and, if so, whether he can state who is responsible, and what steps it is intended to take by the War Office in the matter.

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the attention of the Secretary of State has been called to the verdict of the jury regarding the field day arrangements at Aldershot on Monday last, to the effect that the cause of the deaths of four men and 400 reported (besides unreported) cases of sickness was want of proper food before starting for the field day, want of adequate refreshment whilst actually engaged in the operations, and unsuitability of head-dress worn; if so, can he inform the House who is responsible for the defects in the arrangements and what measures are to be adopted to avoid similar occurrences in the future.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will consider the possibility of issuing a forage cap which will protect more than a third of a man's head, and an emergency ration for home service; and if the War Office will discourage the drill and manœuvre of troops when the temperature is of abnormal severity.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what are the results of the inquiry into the fatalities and casualties among the troops in the operations near Aldershot on Monday, and whether such risk will be obviated by amended regulations in future.

MR. BARTLEY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state how many soldiers suffered from the effects of sunstroke on Monday last at Aldershot, and how many died; whether the head-covering worn by the troops on that occasion was the same as that worn at the Salisbury manœuvres in 1898, when sixty-one cases of sunstroke occurred; and whether any, and what, steps have been taken since 1898 with a view of supplying the troops with some head-covering suitable to protect them from the effects of the sun.

MR. WYNDHAM: There are five questions on the Paper arising out of the deplorable and, I believe, unprecedented casualties which occurred at Aldershot on Monday, the 11th, in the names of hon. Members for East Clare, South-east Essex, Sunderland, East Northamptonshire, and North Islington. If these hon. Members will allow me, I will endeavour to cover all the points raised with which I am at present in a position to deal. The Commander-in-Chief directed by telegram on the 12th that an inquiry should be held, and a reply was received on the same day to the effect that action had already been taken. Reports have been received from the General Officer commanding, Aldershot, and the Surgeon-General. I have also had the advantage of speaking to the Adjutant-General, who returned from Aldershot this morning, but further particulars will be forthcoming from officers commanding the various regiments. The facts were as follows:—On Monday, the 11th of June, a field day was ordered at Aldershot, and a total of 18,002 men came on parade. The general order in force on all such occasions is that the men are to get their breakfast before starting, and that they are to be provided with light refreshments at some time during the day. The method of carrying out that order is left to the regimental authorities. The breakfast consists of bread and tea; and there is no reason to believe that any regiment failed to get breakfast before starting. The light refreshment may consist of sandwiches, but the most popular thing with the men is bread and cheese. The men dine on their return to camp, and very much prefer these arrangements to carrying an emergency ration, which would not be palatable unless a prolonged halt were made for cooking it. The light refreshment of sandwiches, or bread and cheese, may either be served out to the men before they start, for them to carry in their haversacks, or it may be arranged that a canteen cart shall meet the regiment at some specified point. That is a matter entirely for regimental arrangement, and one upon which it would be injudicious to lay down uniform regulations. On Monday morning when the troops started there was, the General commanding states, no exceptional heat; on the contrary he expected rain. But about 10 o'clock great heat began to be felt, and as it continued the "halt" was sounded at 10.30 and the "cease fire" at 11.15. It was then directed that the men should be marched back as easily as possible and with such periods of rest as their officers might think desirable. There is general testimony to the suddenness with which the heat wave came on; and, in particular, Major-General Hemming, commanding the division in which was the Highland Light Infantry, testified from personal observation that not a man of that battalion fell out before the march back was begun. On the previous day the General Officer commanding had personally instructed brigadiers and divisional commanders that their men, should they show any signs of fatigue, were to be halted, and, if necessary, to take no further part in the operations. But during the march back the severe heat was very much felt; a large number of men fell out; twenty-eight cases were received in hospital suffering severely from effects of the sun, of whom four have died, and twenty-nine suffering slightly. With the exception of these four men the other patients have made rapid recoveries. The whole distance covered by the troops was at the outside about fourteen miles, and in many cases less. On the question of the head-dress. In most regiments the head-dress worn was the field cap, of which I have placed a specimen in the Tea-room. This cap was designed to afford greater protection than the Glengarry, which it has superseded in the great majority of our regiments. The problem of designing an ideal field cap is not an easy one. The cap must be sufficiently light and compact to be carried conveniently in the breast or haversack of the soldier when wearing his helmet, and it is also impossible to ignore altogether the soldier's view of what constitutes a smart head-dress. Before this melancholy occurrence the Adjutant-General was at work on a sunshade to be attached to the field cap. But the best course is undoubtedly that all men in possession of helmets should wear them in summer time, whatever the forecast of the weather; and that men, principally in the Royal Reserves, who are still, owing to the exigencies of the war, unprovided with helmets, should not be allowed to undergo severe exertion at a distance from their barracks. The Colonel in command has notified to the General Officer commanding, Aldershot, his regret that this course was not adopted, and has directed that it shall be followed in future. Amid much that is regrettable I am glad to know that fourteen doctors and an ambulance were in attendance to mitigate the sufferings to which the troops were exposed by a sudden and unforeseen rise of temperature. I cannot conclude without expressing my regret at the attempt which has been made in some quarters to fix blame on particular individuals who are in no way responsible.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I hope the hon. Gentleman will be able to tell us, if not now at a later date, what actually happened with regard to the supply of food to the men. He has not told us at what hour the men started, whether the men were supplied with food before they started out, and whether food reached them when out or not.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I did state that the men were supplied with food before starting. I do not know whether food in all cases reached the men, because that is a matter as to which I must get the reports of the officers commanding the individual regiments. With the exception of the Army Service Corps and the Army Medical Corps, no troops started before six o'clock, and some not until eight o'clock or twenty minutes past eight.

MR. BARTLEY: Do I understand that the head-dress worn on Monday was the same as that worn during the manoeuvres in 1898, when there were sixty-one cases of sunstroke?

*MR. WYNDHAM: In the majority of cases the field cap was in use in 1898.

MR. BARTLEY: But did not considerable discussion take place at the time, and was not some promise held out in 1898 that there would be a reform in the head-dress?

*MR. WYNDHAM: There has been some discussion, and attempts have been made to improve the head-dress. I still hold that the better solution is to wear the proper head-dress—the helmet—and not attempt to use the field cap for purposes for which it was not intended.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): Is not the adoption of the slouch cap which has given so much satisfaction in South Africa under consideration?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I hope that some day the forces of the Empire may wear the head-dresses which have become dear to many of us owing to recent operations.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the difference between the temperature of Sunday and Monday was only five degrees?

*MR. WYNDHAM: The heat came on suddenly on Monday morning, but it was because the temperature had been excessive on Sunday that the General Officer commanding gave personal instructions to the brigadiers and divisional commanders.

In reply to a question by MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis),

*MR. WYNDHAM said: There were no signs of distress up to the time of the operations coming to a close. All the cases arose during the march back. Whether the men should be halted is a matter entirely in the hands, and it was left on this occasion exclusively in the hands, of the commanding officer of each particular unit.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: But were the men halted in accordance with the orders of the General? Will you ascertain that?

*MR. WYNDHAM: When I get all the evidence I will see what steps were taken. I have evidence that some of the regiments showed a great disposition to march on and were not checked by their officers.

SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devonshire, Honiton): Have I understood aright that the helmet is in future to be universally worn during manœuvres?

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Commander-in-Chief has issued instructions that in summer, whatever the weather, the helmet is to be worn, and that troops unprovided with helmets are not to take part in exhausting operations.

VOLUNTEERS—PAYMENT OF CAMP ALLOWANCES—LEAVE TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

MR. BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): On behalf of the hon. and gallant Member for the Central Division of Sheffield, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if, having regard to the fact that numbers of Volunteers are working men needing weekly pay for the support of their families, and that neither the State nor private employers can allow more than fourteen days leave on civil pay, arrangements can be made for Volunteers receiving the allowances granted by the War Office if in camp for fourteen days or over every week during the camp instead of some time afterwards, when the returns and proportion of attendance to strength has been checked.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Under Paragraph 24 of the Memorandum of Instructions relating to pay in Volunteer camps, the pay and allowances in question are payable at such intervals as the brigadier or the commanding officer of the unit may direct. The matter is left to corps arrangements. The interpretation put by the hon. and gallant Member on the notification as to leave of Government employees is incorrect. The intention of the Government is to give a special extra leave of fourteen days. This, together with the Volunteers' ordinary holiday which many of them have usually devoted to the Volunteer camps, will in the majority of cases go far to make up a month's time in camp.

VOLUNTEER EMERGENCY PROPOSALS.

MR. BOSCAWEN: On behalf of the hon. Member for the Central Division of Sheffield, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if, having regard to the belief of some employers that if they give facilities for the Volunteers in their employ to go into camp for at least fourteen days, as required by the War Office, they will be expected to do the same every year, he will once more give a positive assurance that this special effort is only made this year, in consequence of the number of Regular troops out of the country.

*MR. WYNDHAM: May I remind my hon. and gallant friend of words which I used on the 12th March?—

“I wish the House to understand distinctly that this is an emergency scheme for this year and this year only. . . . I wish the House to keep it in mind that it is because we are in a year of emergency, and it is because the Militia are embodied, that we make these emergency proposals with regard to the Volunteers.”†

MOUNTED INFANTRY VOLUNTEERS —CAMP ALLOWANCES.

MR. BOSCAWEN: On behalf of the hon. Member for the Central Division of Sheffield, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the capitation grant for Mounted Infantry Volunteers has yet been fixed, and if the camp allowance for the current year will be at the same rate as that decided upon for the Yeomanry.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The first question has led to a good deal of correspondence and discussion, but I shall be able to give the required information very shortly. The camp allowance will be at the same rate as for Yeomanry, provided that 50 per cent. of the strength of the company is present in camp for a fortnight.

H.M.S. “EUROPA”—BELLEVILLE BOILERS.

MR. ALLAN (Gateshead): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state the number of days H.M.S. “Europa” took to steam to Australia, and what was her average speed during the voyage and consumption of fuel per day; whether he has any report of the Belleville boilers, fitted on this vessel, from the Admiralty inspector who was on board; what is the extent of the repairs necessitated to the boilers after her arrival on the station; and if the heat between decks was insupportable to the crew.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The number of days of actual steaming occupied by the “Europa” on the voyage from Plymouth to Sydney was forty-nine days. The speed varied from eleven to thirteen knots, the average being a little under twelve, which is about the usual speed for these voyages by Her Majesty's ships when there is no urgency. The total coal consumption was about 6,000 tons.

† See The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxx., p. 612.

The coal consumption of the “Europa” was known to be very large before she left England compared with that of her sister ships fitted with similar boilers, and for that reason an inspector of machinery was sent out in her to investigate the cause. This, so far as we know at present, he has not been successful in doing, and it is not probable that we shall be able to find out the cause of the high coal consumption until the ship returns to England, and the necessary examination of the engines, where the main fault probably lies, can be made. The ship was detained at Malta for some time while some experimental trials were being made, but these did not throw any sufficient light on the cause of the high consumption. No report has been made by the inspector of machinery attributing the fault to the Belleville boilers. No report has been received as to any repairs being required to the boilers since her arrival at Sydney. The stokers suffered considerably from the heat in the passage through the Red Sea, especially some of the younger men. There is no reason to suppose that the heat between decks was greater than is usual in other cruisers when passing through those regions.

MR. ALLAN: May I ask how many days the ship took in steaming from Plymouth to Australia?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have answered the hon. Member as to the number of days she was steaming. She was detained at Malta for a considerable time for trials.

MR. ALLAN: Is it not a fact that the men could not live between decks of the ship during her passage to Australia on account of the heat, and have not the men classed the ship as “H.M.S. Hell”?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have no information as to that.

MALTA—TUNNY NET TAX.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Governor of Malta, without the advice and consent of the representatives of the Maltese people, imposed a special tax on the use of tunny nets in Maltese waters; whether he is aware that last January, by a resolution in the council passed unanimously by the elected representatives, this order was declared to be rescinded, but was four days subsequently promulgated afresh by the Governor; whether remonstrances against this action, which affects the poorest class of the Maltese community, have reached the Colonial Office; and whether any communications on the subject have passed between the Colonial Office and the Governor of Malta; and what steps he proposes to take in the matter.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The Governor of Malta has not altered the local laws relating to fisheries by the imposition of a special tax on the use of tunny nets in Maltese waters, but, in consequence of the increased attention which is being given to tunny-fishing in Malta, it has been decided to offer for public competition leases of sites for permanent tunny-traps in the territorial waters. On the 17th of January a resolution was passed unanimously by the elected representatives of the Maltese Council of Government, in which they objected to the grant of such leases by public competition, but the Governor disagreed with the resolution, because it appeared to be in the interest of private profit, and detrimental to public welfare. A memorial has been received from a Maltese respecting the grant of a licence for tunny-fishing, and has formed the subject of correspondence between the Colonial Office and the Governor of Malta; but I have received no general remonstrances of the kind suggested in the hon. Member's question. I am not prepared to take any steps in the matter.

AUSTRALIAN COMMONWEALTH BILL —THE APPEAL CLAUSES.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, with a view to the removal of existing uncertainties, he has any objection to stating the precise purport, scope, and operation of the proposed compromise clause of the Australian Commonwealth Bill referring to appeals to the Privy Council.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The effect of the proposed compromise is to prevent any appeal to Her Majesty in Council on any question of the class specified in the Amendment of which notice has been given, unless with the consent of the Governments concerned.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether it is a fact that in the negotiations the Queensland delegate was not consulted?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No; that is not exactly true. Of course, the particular communication in the first instance was with the delegates of the four colonies who had objected to the Amendment which we proposed to the original Bill. As soon as we came to an agreement with the four delegates in question the new agreement was communicated to the Queensland delegate.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Is it a fact that complaint was made on behalf of Queensland that its delegate was not consulted?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No such complaint reached me.

TONGA—BRITISH PROTECTORATE.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any official information has yet arrived in reference to the mission of Mr. Basil Thomson to Tonga; and whether there is any ground for the impression conveyed by recent telegrams that the conditions of the proposed Protectorate are not acceptable to the King and Government of Tonga.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Only a brief telegram has been received from Mr. Thomson stating that he had proclaimed a Protectorate with the approval of the majority of the Tongans, and that the King stated he was satisfied.

ZANZIBAR—CHURCH MISSIONARY STATION AT RABAIS.

MR. DUCKWORTH (Lancashire, Middleton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Church Missionary station at Rabais, East Africa, has been declared to be outside the dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar, and that the Protectorate flag now flies there in place of the Sultan's; and, if so, does it mean that all persons residing there and all persons settling there are free, and could the same course be adopted in regard to the mission stations at Mazeras and Ribe, both of which are in the same neighbourhood of Rabais.

INDIA—BRITISH CAVALRY CARBINES.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he can state what proportion of the British cavalry in India is still armed with the Martini-Henry carbine.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Government of India anticipate that by the end of this month the whole of the British cavalry in India will be armed with magazine carbines. At present one regiment still carries single-loaders.

INDIAN FAMINE AND PLAGUE—STATISTICS—SUGGESTED ROYAL COMMISSION—PARLIAMENTARY GRANT, &c.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he can state the total number of persons on relief works in India, how long the present famine has continued, how many persons have died from hunger and disease, and what is the number of deaths from bubonic plague since the outbreak of the epidemic to the present date.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The total number of persons on relief works in India, according to the latest accounts, is 5,802,000. The famine was caused by the failure of last autumn's rains, and has therefore lasted about seven months. It is absolutely impossible at present to form even an approximate estimate of the number of deaths which it has caused directly or indirectly; in some parts of India where famine has been aggravated by cholera and small-pox the mortality, I fear, has been very heavy; in other large districts where the famine is equally severe, but has not been associated with wholesale epidemic disease the efforts of the Government of India and its organisation of relief have been so successful that the death rate is hardly above the normal. The total number of reported plague deaths from 1896, when the epidemic began, down to last April, was 358,685—that is to say, about one death per annum to every three thousand living inhabitants of India. At the present moment the plague mortality in Bombay is lower than at any period in the three preceding years.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: Can the noble Lord promise to give us the number of deaths that have occurred from famine?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I hope the hon. Gentleman will recollect that the area covered by famine contains 85,000,000 people, and that the number of Europeans and of officials in that district is very small. He will see that, necessarily, a considerable time must elapse before anything like adequate statistics can be obtained, but I shall accelerate the collecting of information as far as I can, and I shall see that it is published as soon as possible.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if his attention has been called to the report of Dr. Kloptsch, administrator of the fund raised in New York for the relief of distress in India, and whether he has any information to the effect, as stated in the report, that vultures, dogs, and jackals have been found devouring human bodies left unburied; and whether in view of the suffering caused by famine and plague throughout India at present, the Government will recommend at once the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the best and speediest method of dealing with the state of affairs now existing in Her Majesty's Indian Empire.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have seen the telegram of Dr. Kloptsch, and have read similar statements in one or two of the numerous reports that have reached me. These statements only apply to the districts, limited in number, I am glad to say, where cholera and small-pox have attacked the famine camps, thus forming a combination which for the moment baffles any administrative palliation. A Commission of great weight and authority was appointed in 1897 to report on the best method of dealing with famine in India, and its suggestions, which were published in 1898 after a most elaborate and searching inquiry, have been of great value. Another similar Commission was appointed in 1898 to deal with the plague, and has produced a very important and exhaustive Report, part of which only has yet been published. I do not, therefore, propose at present to advise the appointment of a Royal Commission, though it may hereafter be advisable when the present epidemics are over to utilise the experience gained by making it the subject of further Reports.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Arising out of that answer, may I ask whether the Government propose to wait until millions of people meet their death by starvation before they will inquire as to a remedy?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I hope the monsoon which has begun will very shortly put an end to the famine. I think the hon. Gentleman will see that it is quite impossible with only a limited number of officials at our disposal to ask them to put on one side the more pressing work of ministering to the wants of the distressed in order to make inquiries and ascertain statistics.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: The noble Lord admits that the deaths are so numerous that bodies are unburied and are even being devoured by the dogs. Will he urge on the Government the desirability of raising at once whatever money may be necessary in order to put an end to this scandal and give some relief to the people?

LORD G. HAMILTON: It is not a question of money. The only method by which you can deal with the enormous number of people who are suffering from hunger over great areas is to aggregate them in camps in healthy sites. Unfortunately, in the west of India there has been no rain for the last seven months, and the difficulty is not so much the scarcity of food as the purity of the water. If cholera attacks in its worst form one of the camps, it so terrifies the people that they fly in all directions, carrying with them the germs of disease and dying by the roadsides and in the ditches. And the difficulty does not end there even, because not only does the panic affect the people who are congregated in the camps, but it affects the hospital assistants, camp followers, and camp scavengers. I believe that on more than one occasion the European officer after a panic has found himself with but few assistants in the presence of the dead and dying, all the rest having fled. It is due to such a state of things and not to a lack of money that this mortality arises.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: The noble Lord has not said whether it would not be possible by the application of money, by the employment of a sufficient number of assistants—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! This is now becoming a debate. The hon. Member must give notice of any further question.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: With great respect, I desire simply to ask a question—

*MR. SPEAKER: I have said that the hon. Member is proceeding to debate the answer given. That is not proper.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Oh, of course not. You spend sixty millions of money on war, and let the people of India die of famine.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has received a memorial from the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce affirming the responsibility of this country for the well-being of the people of India, and urging Her Majesty's Government to at once invite Parliament to vote an Imperial Grant in relief of the Indian famine; and whether he will state what reply has been given to the memorialists.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I received about a month ago a memorial from the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce, the purport of which is correctly stated in the hon. Member's question. My reply was to the effect that the Government of India had undertaken to prevent deaths from famine, and to relieve suffering so far as those objects could be attained by the expenditure of money and the administrative machinery at their disposal; that they had been informed that, if their financial resources should prove insufficient to carry out this undertaking,

Her Majesty's Government would be ready to give help in whatever form might be thought most advisable, and that, having regard to what the famine had already cost, and might be expected to cost on the one hand, and to the state of the Indian finances on the other, there seemed to be at present no reason to apprehend that such help would be required.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: They are collecting for India in America.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to vote a sum of money for the relief of the famine-stricken people of India.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not know of any ground at present for initiating the great change of policy suggested by the hon. Member.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: Although six millions of people are starving!

NATIONAL GALLERY—PRECAUTIONS AGAINST FIRE.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if any steps are proposed in order to isolate the National Gallery in view of the grave danger from fire to which the building is now subject.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he intends to adopt any measures to ensure greater security from fire of the buildings and contents of the National Gallery; and, if so, what measures, and when does he propose to adopt them.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been directed to a fire which took place on 30th May in the corner of the block of buildings in 12, Pall Mall East, adjoining the National Gallery; and whether, seeing that Block B, the south end of St. George's Barracks, forming the canteen, and presumably containing combustible material, absolutely abuts upon the wall of the Great Gallery containing Turner's pictures; that the gable wall of this canteen is only 18 inches thick and has a chimney flue running up it, apparently built into the walls of the National Gallery itself; also that the back windows of the gallery are at right angles to those of the canteen, and, as they are only some six or eight feet from the latter, in the case of the canteen catching fire and the wind blowing from the north, it would be almost impossible to prevent the flames being driven into the windows of the gallery; and also that no precaution could prevent damage to the national collection from flames, sparks, smoke, or heating of the party wall, he will consider the desirability of cutting off the building containing our priceless national collection from the barracks on the one hand and the group of inflammable shops on the other.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): The fire which occurred on the 30th May last in premises adjacent to the National Gallery tested the arrangements hitherto made for the protection of the gallery against fire, and the result was in the main satisfactory. In the opinion of Her Majesty's Government the risk at the present time is slight, but in order to reduce it to a minimum, negotiations have been commenced with the owners of the adjacent property with a view to the isolation of the western end of the National Gallery. Should these negotiations fail, which I hope may not be the case, Parliament will be asked in the usual manner to furnish powers to the Government for the immediate acquisition of the property in question. I do not know whether after this the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire requires me to give the answer prepared to his question to the First Lord of the Treasury.

DR. FARQUHARSON: If the right hon. Gentleman has any further information I shall be glad to hear it.

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS: The second paragraph of the question of the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire is apparently taken en bloc from the file of the Daily Graphic of 6th June, 1895, which I have with me. This statement is out of date and consequently inaccurate. I have already on more than one occasion explained to the hon. Member in the House that Block B of St. George's Barracks is not in actual contact (save by a screen wall) with the wall of the National Gallery; and that the canteen has been removed to the other end of the barracks. The statement with regard to the position of the chimney flue and the gallery windows is not correct—the flue being part of the National Gallery and not of the barracks, and, further, is not in use. The House will recollect that the barracks will be removed as soon as those now in course of construction at Millbank are completed, and further, that the Government last year purchased a large block of property in St. Martin's Street, which has since been cleared.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As a desire has been expressed that the Railway Accidents Bill, as amended, shall be reprinted, it would be inconvenient to take it on Monday, as originally arranged, after the Australian Commonwealth Bill. The Ecclesiastical Assessment (Scotland) Bill will therefore be substituted for the Railway Bill.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the Committee stage of the Australian Commonwealth Bill be taken from day to day until it is finished?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt it will be, if necessary.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Mr. HALSEY reported from the Committee of Selection, That they had discharged the following Member from the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures: Mr. Munro Ferguson (added in respect of the Agricultural Holdings Bill); and had appointed in substitution: Sir William Wedderburn.

CLASS IV.

1. £5,585,099, to complete the sum for Board of Education.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): It is always difficult, in considering a Vote of this character, to discuss it with any approach to accuracy, when we have not before us, as is the case to-day, the Report for the past year on Education. I only wish, on this occasion, to say a few words with regard to one or two topics raised by this Vote. The first is as to the position of the teachers. The right hon. Gentleman is well aware that the teachers of this country are the only persons of their class in the world who are subject to arbitrary and capricious dismissal. It is necessary, I think, if we are to have a body of self-respecting men engaged in the great work of education, that they should not be subject to arbitrary and capricious dismissal at the hands of a single individual. As we were informed by the Report of the Royal Commission, in too many cases the whole management of schools—of State supported schools—is practically entirely in the hands of a single individual. It is not a position in which any elementary teacher should be placed that he should be dependent entirely upon the goodwill of one individual for the permanency and security of his position. There is just one other point to which I should like to refer, and that is the question of training colleges. The right hon. Gentleman told us that it was open to Nonconformists to found training colleges, and that the State would be ready to make a grant to them. But we hold it is the business of the State in this country, as it is in every civilised country in the world, to establish these training colleges on its own account. It is perfectly monstrous that Nonconformists, as such, should be asked to establish colleges for the purpose of training teachers who are to teach in our public elementary schools, and it is absolutely unreasonable. Such a demand would not be made in any other civilised country in the world. We ask that the admitted deficiency in the supply of training colleges should be made up by the State, and that men who are inclined to enter into the teaching profession should not be excluded from that profession simply because they do not happen to belong to a denomination which has an ample supply of training colleges. There is a question relating to Wales to which I also wish to ask attention for a few minutes. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President has always treated Wales with great fairness and courtesy, and I wish to ask him now whether the Board of Education have taken any steps in the course of the reorganisation to which they have now set their hands to deal out justice to Wales in the matter of Museum grants. Speaking on the 4th of August last year* the right hon. Gentleman said that Wales would no doubt receive favourable consideration in regard to this matter, and I would again remind him that out of the money which is set apart for this purpose, while Scotland receives £12,000 per year and Ireland £22,000 for their museums, Wales gets absolutely nothing whatever. Scotland and Ireland too get many thousands of pounds for purposes which are slightly outside the Museum grant. While successive Ministers have expressed the utmost sympathy with this desire on the part of Wales for a due and proper share of the Museum grant, nothing practical has yet been done, and I can only hope that the right hon. Gentleman, if he is not in a position to give us a definite promise, will at least not weaken in any respect declarations previously made by Ministers on this subject. In visiting provincial museums on the Continent I have been very much struck to see how far they are in advance of us, and I have almost been ashamed to think that a wealthy country like this should not do more for its provincial museums. The amount which appears on the Vote by way of grant to local museums has, I believe, been increased from £1,000 to £1,500. I venture to say that that is a miserably inadequate sum for an object of this kind. These museums are intended for educational purposes, and in Wales we have done our best in past years to promote such purposes in connection with them. I think we deserve well of the Government for what we have done, and I earnestly appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to give us help in this respect.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): I have no intention of retraversing the wide field occupied in the course of this debate, but I wish as a Nonconformist to express my strong dissent from the views of a brother Nonconformist—I refer to the hon. Member for West Fife—who appears to be under an impression which is, I think, shared by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that these religious grievances of which we hear in connection with education are to a considerable extent manufactured grievances: that they are the grievances of agitators. The hon. Member for West Fife pointed out that we hear nothing in this House of complaints by parents themselves, with regard to the character of the religious education to which their children are subjected. Now, the hon. Member is a frequent attendant in this House—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! This question was fully debated yesterday, and a division was taken upon it. I do not think it would be regular to raise the same debate again to-day.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: I am about to refer to the action of the Department in connection with several cases in which children have been compelled to attend Roman Catholic or Church of England schools, contrary to the wishes of their parents. If I am not in order I will not, of course, proceed.

THE CHAIRMAN: That very point was debated yesterday, and, a division having taken place upon it, I must assume that the debate is closed. I do not think, therefore, it is open to the hon. Member to raise the same point again to-day, although the same Vote may be under consideration.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: There is one case to which I wish to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, because I believe that very shortly the Department will have to deal with it, if it has not already done so. It is a case at Bolton-cum-Seacombe, where the school board has lately introduced not only the Apostles' Creed, but also a portion of the Church Catechism into the religious teaching in its school. A large number of the parents have undoubtedly shown by their action that they are not indifferent in this matter. On the contrary, they have evinced a most lively interest in it. A vigorous protest has been entered against the action of the board, and I believe that no fewer than 948 have signed returns expressing strong dissent from the course which has been pursued. If the parents of the children attending elementary schools are indifferent to religion so far as they themselves are concerned, it is clear from this that they are not indifferent where their children are affected.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is now replying to a speech made yesterday in a former debate, and I do not think he ought to do that. If he wishes to ask a question with regard to any particular case he may fairly do so, but he cannot re-open a debate which occurred yesterday, and upon which a division was taken.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: Very well, Sir. I will conclude by expressing the simple hope that the facts to which I have drawn attention will receive careful attention at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman; because undoubtedly the decision the Department may come to in this case will affect the action of the school authorities in several other places.

MR. GODDARD (Ipswich): I have a question to ask with regard to a rather small matter of administration. In the Vote now under consideration there are two classes of servants of the Department—senior examiners, of whom there are six, with salaries ranging from £650 to £800, and junior examiners, of whom there are eighteen, with salaries varying from £250 to £600. There is also an assistant examiner, with a salary rising from £250 to £550. I wish to ask what are the special functions of these examiners, and whether they are called examiners by way of giving them a different name, so that they may be nominated instead of being called upon to pass the examination which ordinary Civil Service clerks have to submit themselves to. I understand that the duties of these officers are almost the same as those of the ordinary clerk, and that the name of examiner is simply a title. I believe the Treasury has pressed on several occasions that these offices should be thrown open to competition, instead of being filled up by patronage or nomination, and I should like an explanation why this has not been done, and why this injustice is inflicted upon those who have to pass the examination. No doubt, in a Department of this kind, it may be desirable to have certain offices requiring superior knowledge filled by nomination, but I would venture to suggest that there are already far too many such offices thus filled, with the result that men quite incompetent for the work are enabled to avoid the examination and creep into the service.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): Before this debate concludes I wish to add my appeal to that made by the hon. Member for Flint Burghs that something should be done in order to secure teachers against arbitrary dismissal. I am afraid there are a great many cases in which injustice has been done. I know the right hon. Gentleman takes the view that he cannot interfere except in certain specific cases. But surely if there is an abuse—if money voted by Parliament for definite purposes is used by the local authorities in such a way as to create an abuse, then the Department which has in charge the administration of the Act has a right to interfere and to withhold the grant if it is used for improper purposes. I believe that Parliament would back up the right hon. Gentleman in any action he might take in that direction. It is not merely a question of Voluntary schools. I am told that some of the board schools are quite as bad as the Voluntary schools in this respect, and that there is a lot of petty oppression, arising sometimes from personal pique, and at other times from party or sectarian disputes. The only difficulty is in dealing with the manager, whose position is practically paramount and permanent, and who is not responsible to any local authority or to the people of the district. In his case there is no court of appeal, whereas in the case of a school board at the end of three years there is an appeal to the ratepayers of the district, and my experience is that when such an appeal is made the people usually back up the schoolmaster. I trust that, before this debate concludes, the right hon. Gentleman will be able to hold out a hope that something will be done in this direction, seeing that there appears to be a pretty unanimous opinion in the House in favour of administrative action. Then I should like to know whether any general directions have been given with regard to the audit of the accounts of Voluntary schools. I believe that under the Act of 1897 there was provision made for some general supervision over this audit. One case which has been brought under any notice is, I must say, rather extraordinary. I find that in a good many cases the managers of Voluntary schools charge rent in respect of the buildings. I do not think that ought to be, and under the general instructions to auditors the right hon. Gentleman might prevent a thing of that kind happening. What is done is this. A building is erected by an educational trust, and the local managers find that they should like some money for the rebuilding of a church or the payment of an organist, or something of that sort, and they manipulate the accounts in such a way as to be able to get £50, £100, or in some cases even £300, in name of rent. It is really utilised for other purposes—that is to say, we are voting money here for educational purposes which is used with the connivance of the Education Department for totally alien purposes. Surely the right hon. Gentleman could stop this. I will give you a case in point. In this case I do not know what is done with the money. In the town of Eastbourne the school accommodation was not sufficient, and the Education Department interfered and said, "You must increase the accommodation for the children there." What was done? A company was got up—everything is run on limited liability principles in these days, even sectarian schools—and one of the shareholders, I believe, is a gentleman known to the Vice-President of the Council. He is the largest shareholder, having, I believe, 500 shares in this educational sectarian syndicate. There are no voluntary subscriptions at all towards the maintenance of that school, but I find that rent is charged amounting to £117 10s. Out of that £12 10s. is payable to his Grace the Duke of Devonshire in respect of something or other; I do not know what it is. This company pays a dividend. Surely this is the introduction of a novel principle into the educational policy of this country. Would the right hon. Gentleman say that the Education Department would tolerate a thing of that sort in connection with the training colleges? Would he allow Nonconformists to build a training college and pay 3, 4, or 5 per cent. dividend on it out of money voted by Parliament? The Duke of Devonshire gets 3 or 4 per cent. on excellent security—on the money voted by Parliament. Surely 2½ per cent. is enough for his Grace. Besides the interest he gets £12 10s. I do not know what it is—ground rent or what not. It is too trivial a sum to amount to anything in the nature of a scandal, and I am sure the £12 10s. or the interest on the shares is not a material matter to the Duke of Devonshire, but it is a novel principle that £117 10s. voted by Parliament for education goes to a private enterprise. In fact, we are voting money to pay dividends. This is a novel principle which ought not to be tolerated, and I say that the right hon. Gentleman ought to give general instructions as to what is to be allowed and what is not to be allowed in the auditing of these accounts. It is perfectly competent to do so. The section is a vague one, and it is left to the right hon. Gentleman himself. As far as I am able to see there is no Return to show what has been done. I will ask one or two specific questions about this case. I think it is an important one so far as the principle is concerned. I should like to know whether there are any voluntary subscriptions towards this school at all. I am told there are not. I should also like to know with regard to the management of the school whether there is any kind of control. I am told it is managed simply by the syndicate and board of directors under the Companies Acts. If that is so it is an extraordinary case, and a novel case.

*MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): In the case of the school at Eastbourne you have not only a novel case, but something like a scandal. There must be some element of a public nature about the management and constitution of a school to justify the payment of a grant towards that school, but in this case at Eastbourne a precedent has been created and permitted by the Board of Education in the establishment of a public elementary school and a grant-receiving school by a limited liability company. It has among its shareholders the President of the Board of Education. It is a dividend-earning, and perhaps a dividend-paying company. I am not sure whether a dividend has been paid. I submit to the Government that is a position which ought never to have been allowed to exist, and I question if it ever would have been allowed to exist but for the peculiar circumstances of the case and the persons connected with it. I know that the President of the Board of Education is not personally interested. I doubt whether he knows very much about the matter himself. It may be all done by his agent in the locality, but I wish to press upon the notice of the Government that this kind of thing ought not to have been allowed in connection with public elementary education. I hope, now that my hon. friend has drawn attention to the matter, this anomaly, not to say scandal, will cease. There is one matter to which I should like to refer further, because in his second speech last night the Vice-President of the Council did not refer to it himself, although some discussion took place regarding it. It is the question of further facilities for the training of teachers. The view of the Vice-President himself is that there should be an extension of the opportunities afforded by the training colleges, and in that view we all concur. A day training college is not of that cloistered, seminaristic nature which attaches to the other training colleges. The students in a day training college are not wholly separated from other students. They do not all belong to the same class. They intend to follow the same course of instruction, because in professional and technical matters they can specialise. They are in fact students of a university college. A good many excellent day training colleges do exist in the university colleges of this country. There is one in my own district, and one of the most successful of all, in Nottingham. The number of students attending the day training colleges would be larger if the grant to the colleges were more liberal. For some reason which I have been unable to understand a grant of £50 a year is made for a man, and £35 a year for a woman—that is to a residential college. The grant paid to a day training college is less. It is in respect of a man £35 and in respect of a woman £30. Part of that is paid towards the student's maintenance and board, and £10 goes to the college for paying fees and tuition expenses. There is a disparity of £15 in the case of a man and of £5 in the case of a woman. There were last year something less than 1,000 students. There are this year something more than 1,000. I cannot get the exact figures, because the Blue-book is not detailed on this point. I estimate that it will take £10,000 to raise the grant to the day training college students. It will take more than £10,000 as you multiply the students in these colleges. The colleges are petitioning, and I believe the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, directly or indirectly, have asked that this grant shall be made larger. I respectfully urge upon the Vice-President the propriety and almost the necessity of increasing the grants to the day training colleges, so as to enable students who wish to go to these institutions to proceed thither. At present it is easier and cheaper for a student to go to a residential college than to a day training college. The right hon. Gentleman expressed himself in favour of the day training colleges. A simple and obvious method of adding to their usefulness is to grant £10,000 or £15,000 for the purpose. I hope he will not sit down without referring to that point.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): I have already gone at considerable length into the question of training colleges, and I have nothing to add. As to the grants to the residential colleges and the day training colleges, I expressed my own personal opinion that they ought to be equalised.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): The right hon. Gentleman did not say in what way he thought they should be equalised. I hope there will be no levelling in the way of bringing the higher contributions down to the point of the lower ones.

MR. YOXALL: Will that be done?

SIR J. GORST: I can assure hon. Members that their arguments and their views will be laid by me before the proper authority—the Board of Education. The practice is really quite unfair that is growing up in this House of speaking to me as though I were a member of the Government, with absolute power to do as I like.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not say that I wish to treat him unfairly. I only wish to know what his proposal will be on behalf of the Board of Education.

SIR J. GORST: Several of these matters were discussed last night, and I have said that in my opinion they deserve very careful consideration. How can I within such a very short time state what decision my noble friend has come to? It is perfectly unreasonable to ask it. The Treasury have to be consulted on the subject; the financial consequences of any reform have to be considered; therefore it is quite impossible to come down to the House the very day after the matter has been brought up and announce the decision of the Government. I have nothing to add to what I said yesterday, and I do not know that any advantage is obtained by raking up again this afternoon matters which were fully discussed yesterday. The same remark applies exactly to the question of the dismissal of teachers. I stated yesterday what my personal opinions were, and that the questions raised would receive most careful consideration. I admitted there was a grievance, and I can say no more in answer to the appeal of the hon. Member for West Nottingham.

MR. YOXALL: I made no appeal on that point. My appeal was with regard to the day training colleges.

SIR J. GORST: I beg the hon. Member's pardon; it was the hon. Member for Flint who raised the point. With regard to the question of a Welsh museum, I have often expressed the regret of the Department that it is impossible to establish a central museum in Wales until we know what the capital of Wales is. That we have never been able to ascertain. But I think hon. Members who advocate this proposal are getting a little out of date, because the whole trend of the policy of the Board of Education is to have one great central museum in the Victoria and Albert Museum at South Kensington, and from that museum to send collections—very important and valuable collections, which are from time to time exchanged—to various provincial museums. We have now nothing whatever to do with Edinburgh or Dublin—they are quite separated from our Department; we have now only one central museum for which we are responsible—namely, the Victoria and Albert Museum. I can only say that within recent years enormous progress has been made there, both in the number and in the character of the collections which are sent to provincial museums. For instance, there are now no fewer than three collections of extremely beautiful water-colours which give examples of the whole history of water-colour art in this country. These collections are continually being sent about the country from place to place, and I believe Wales has had its full share of those collections. There are other collections arranged from time to time in regard to which local authorities are consulted; collections are sent which contain the objects the local authorities consider most useful to the educational requirements of the neighbourhood. I feel myself quite certain that it is by far the better policy for the diffusion of interest in art to have a great central museum such as we have in the Victoria and Albert Museum—a museum which has no rival in any part of the world. That museum is of its kind quite unique, and it is extraordinary that, while the people of this country perhaps scarcely understand its value, foreigners from all parts of Europe come to see it, and they all admit that there is nothing of its kind to be found in any foreign country in the world. That museum is not a museum appropriated to the people of London; it is a museum which forms the nucleus of a great number of collections which are continually being sent about the country, by that means diffusing a knowledge of and an acquaintance with art in a manner which is perfectly extraordinary. That, I think, is a policy to which it is far better the finances of the country should be directed than the establishment of provincial museums, which, if established at all, should be established by the people of the locality. It is certainly much better that there should be this circulation from a great central museum. The question of the examiners has been raised, and I have been asked why they are called "examiners." There is nothing more difficult than to find out why certain names are given to certain people. I do not know why I am called "the Vice-President," nor do I know why an examiner is called "an examiner," or a clerk "a clerk." But these officials exercise most important functions in the Board of Education. They are the officials who receive and deal with the enormous correspondence which is carried on by the Board of Education with various schools, inspectors, teachers, and so on all over the kingdom. They are divided into two classes, "Senior" and "Junior," because it is thought that after a man has served the country for a certain length of time he deserves promotion, and the two classes are made in order to mark the advance of a man in the service of the country. The examiners are most useful officials, without whom the work could not possibly be carried out. I am asked why they are not admitted by competitive examination. That question has never arisen in my time. The hon. Member said that constant representations had been made by the Treasury to the Education Department that they ought to be selected by competitive examination. All I can say is that no such representations have ever been made in my day, and therefore I have not had occasion to consider the subject, and I am not prepared off hand, without any notice, to say why it has been thought desirable in former years by succeeding Governments to have these officers nominated instead of selected by competitive examination as are the officials in some Departments. If the hon. Member had given me notice of his intention of asking this question I would have tried to put myself in a better position to answer. It is a practice which has existed ever since the Board of Education was constituted, it has been approved by successive Governments, and I have had too many things to think of since I have been at the Education Department to trouble myself with considering questions which nobody else has raised. The hon. Member for Carnarvon is very much exercised as to the payment of rent for schools. A reasonable and proper amount of rent is an expenditure without which it is impossible that education can be carried on. You must have a building, and if you do not possess one you must hire. Rent is constantly paid by school boards, voluntary associations, and managers of schools all over the country, and as long as the amount of rent is reasonable and moderate it is an entirely proper expenditure for the purposes of education. It is quite true there have been a good many scandals connected with the matter from time to time, and I am sorry to say that some of the worst offenders have been not Churchmen, but Nonconformists. Rent has been charged for chapels and so on which has been quite unreasonable and improper. I think, however, that that is only a matter of past history, and that at the present day, under existing arrangements at all events, no such improper charges are made.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER: I think the motive for charging those rents has disappeared.

SIR J. GORST: Since the abolition of the 17s. 6d. limit there is no object in making that kind of fictitious charge. The hon. Member then asked me a very proper question with regard to the audit of school accounts. In 1897 it was made compulsory on all schools receiving the Aid Grant, and by an article in the Code of the same year the Department made it compulsory on all Voluntary schools, that the accounts should be audited. Those accounts have to be audited by a banker or a professional accountant.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Who selects the auditor?

SIR J. GORST: The auditor is selected by the school itself. That auditor has to be either a banker or a professional accountant, or, if they cannot obtain such an auditor, they may apply to the Education Department for permission to appoint someone else, and in a few cases persons such as agents, auctioneers, and people of that kind have been sanctioned. But the audit is now in every case a very real and proper audit. The hon. Member seems to think that the Education Department might select the auditors. That would be an enormous task, and one which the Department could not possibly perform. It would be impossible all over the country to pick out men to audit the accounts of village schools, which are frequently extremely simple and short, and really do not require so important a person as a district or Local Government Board auditor or any such public official. I think I have now answered all the questions which have been asked—

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: What about Eastbourne?

SIR J. GORST: The hon. Member not having given me any notice of his intention to ask questions about Eastbourne, I have not provided myself with the information necessary to answer him. I cannot tell him whether or not there are any voluntary subscriptions there, nor can I tell him what arrangements are made for the management of the school. It is quite true the building was constructed by a limited liability company, which receives from the school managers a reasonable and moderate rent for its use, and that rent enables the shareholders of the company to receive a very moderate dividend. That is really the way in which the school was built, when there was no other means by which it could be done. If the hon. Member will propose to build a training college in the same manner and on the same principles, I can assure him the Board of Education will welcome any such efforts, and that every assistance and encouragement shall be given to provide training colleges on similar terms.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: There is just one question I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman. In the higher grade schools about to be established I understand that a grant of about £6 per head will be received from the Government. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to bear in mind that we in Wales are doing the work of these higher grade schools. We rate ourselves, and while it is true that we receive a Treasury grant, that grant amounts to only £2 per head. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will help us to carry out the admirable suggestions made in his excellent speech yesterday with regard to the training of teachers. We are doing our best in the different counties of Wales to induce managers of schools, both Board and Voluntary, to send their pupil teachers to the secondary schools. The difficulty in the way is, of course, financial, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to promise that, as we are doing this work—work of which I know he thoroughly approves—and as we receive only one-third as much with respect of each scholar as will be received in England, our case in regard to help for pupil teachers should be sympathetically considered by him. I will say only one word with regard to the museum question. Our claim for this museum and art gallery stands entirely apart from the educational museum to which he has referred, and his remarks do not apply to that.

*LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): I was very pleased to hear what the Vice-President of the Council said in regard to the circulation of art objects. Very great progress has been made at the museum within the past fifteen or eighteen months, and I hope the Vice-President will continue to urge forward that system as much as he possibly can. At the same time I hope he will not carry that system too far, and that he will not carry out the principle of decentralisation as much as he indicated in his speech. He said that the Victoria and Albert Museum was not appropriated for the purposes of London alone, but that it is a national and not a metropolitan museum. We must remember that we are spending an enormous sum of money upon this building, and we are not erecting this enormous building merely as a dépôt or warehouse for objects exclusively for the provinces. I think a great deal has been done latterly to improve the whole condition of things, and there is really only one point with regard to the organisation of that Department to which I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, and that is the absolute necessity of having trained and expert officials among the staff upon whom the duty of buying objects of art devolves. There have been famous scandals in the past about what they have done. They have made extraordinary purchases under extraordinary misapprehensions, and some of the purchases are mentioned in the famous Minute which is a masterpiece of bluff and casuistry quite worthy of the traditions of its illustrious author. There was some doubt as to whether one object was a Tudor piece of work or a piece of work made in Ceylon in the last century. If the right hon. Gentleman will use his influence to secure a better training for those who have to buy these objects for the museum such ludicrous mistakes as those which have been made in the past will be impossible in the future. At the present time an effort is being made to limit the employment of officials at this museum to one particular department. At present the right hon. Gentleman cannot guarantee that when a man is placed in one department he shall stay there. The result is that this man is master of no subject, and as a rule, I am afraid, he is inefficient in most subjects. That is not the fault of the official, if he is constantly moved from one department to another. If the right hon. Gentleman would have separate and distinct departments governed under regular rules and not under the capricious system by which the museum is divided into departments, he would secure a far more highly efficient staff than under present conditions it is possible for him to expect. We are going to build this great museum, and judging from the plans, it will be one of the finest in the world. Here is a splendid opportunity to make this museum a model of classification. The museum at Dublin, which, up to a short time ago, was under the Science and Art Department, is one of the best classified museums in Europe, and there is no reason why this Victoria and Albert Museum should not be as good as the Dublin Museum. In conclusion there is one question which I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, and that is, if he can say when the Report of the Departmental Committee, which has now finished its investigations, is likely to be issued to the public. The Report is of the most vital interest to all who have studied the question of museums, and I hope the publication of this document will not be much longer delayed.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I wish to allude to the appointment of auditors. In many cases the schools are entirely in the hands of the local clergyman. Here is public money being spent, and the clergyman is left to select his own auditor. This is public money, and there ought to be a public auditor. The right hon. Gentleman told us that if we would start a limited liability company to build a training school the Government would accept it, and take on lease the buildings we erect. My hon. friend beside me cited a case—which the Vice-President of the Council approved of—at Eastbourne, where the dividend was paid out of the public grant to a public company. I want to know what is the agreement which the right hon. Gentleman suggests. Is he prepared, if my hon. friends and myself subscribe the capital, or induce others to do so, for these buildings, to give us a repairing lease and pay 3 per cent. interest? That is very good interest from the Government, and I am perfectly certain we should find the capital. These institutions would be built, and the Government would get the benefit of these colleges, and the subscribers would get 3 per cent. interest. Will the right hon. Gentleman give us a specific undertaking to that effect, for as business men we want to know this. It is all very well to answer in this vague way and say that we ought to subscribe the money. We will underwrite it if he likes without any charge, if we have a distinct understanding from the right hon. Gentleman that we shall get 3 per cent. interest on a good repairing lease for fifty years. The right hon. Gentleman can appoint his own auditor. What we require is an understanding that the Government will take our buildings over on a repairing lease, giving us a clear 3 per cent. interest.

*SIR JOHN BRUNNER: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the power of the Board of Education to make proposals regulating the grant to elementary schools is limited to the annual occasion of the presentation of the Code. I understand that it is not presented to the House under any statute, but by Her Majesty's command. It appears to me, therefore, that there is no necessity whatever for the Board of Education to wait till next year to make a proposal to Parliament with regard to the dismissal of teachers. I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether such a proposal could not be made immediately without waiting until next year. There is also another point which I wish to raise. I take it that whenever managers of a Board school or a denominational school give to the Department a reason for the dismissal of a teacher that reason would invariably be communicated to the teacher accused.

SIR J. GORST: The Board of Education can make a distribution of the Parliamentary grant whenever it likes. The Minute will be laid on the Table of the House as soon as it is made. If any financial question is concerned the Board of Education have to obtain the sanction of the Treasury.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer my question about the dismissal of teachers?

SIR J. GORST: I do not wish to pledge myself upon this question, but I may say that the question of giving a dismissed teacher in all cases the reasons for dismissal is being considered by the Lord President of the Council.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER: I might be permitted to point out that if the reasons were given it would only be in accordance with precedent. At the present time, in the case of the medical officer or a relieving officer being dismissed, the reason for his dismissal is always communicated by the Department to the official concerned, and I hope this practice will be followed in the case of the teachers.

*MR. MORRELL (Oxfordshire, Woodstock) desired to obtain from the right hon. Member the Vice-President of the Council an expression of opinion on the matter of specialised training colleges. He was himself satisfied that the reason for there being some difficulty in obtaining suitable teaching staff for the several kinds of elementary schools in town and country, was that these colleges were all run on similar lines as regarded curriculum. The requirements of teachers in regard to the subject matter with which they should be familiar varied in accordance with the position they sought in town and country. The curriculum should vary to meet this; just as high a training being required for the one position as the other, only in a different direction. It might be the best policy to sever that part of the present college course which bore upon secondary education from that which was directed to the training of the teacher as such; even to the extent of requiring a would be teacher to deal with secondary work elsewhere, and prior to his coming to college. At the present time only one-third of the student's time in college is given to the study of methods of teaching and experimental teaching under professors of the art, though it is for this alone these colleges nominally exist. We want more of the training of the teacher in teaching, and less of the secondary school work in the college. If, however, secondary school work is to be carried on in the college, it was obvious some colleges must be found to take up the subjects required by the rural teacher. He was led to make these few remarks at a late hour in the discussion because he had just received a communication from which it appeared that a training college with such a curriculum specialised for rural teachers might be started in 1902, provided the Board of Education would recognise the experiment. He would ask, what were the possibilities of such recognition?

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: I wish to refer to only one point, namely, the payment out of public funds of the rent of Voluntary schools. It involves this anomaly. At present the proprietors of Voluntary schools claim the right of management on the ground that they have erected the buildings, and they then proceed to charge a rent for them. It seems to me, if rent is paid out of public money for these buildings that they are no longer strictly private property, and that the right of management becomes at least disputable.

SIR J. GORST: With reference to the remarks of my hon. friend the Member for the Woodstock Division, I have already expressed myself as favourable to the idea of special training for rural teachers, and if any training college makes a proposal to the Board of Education to have a special curriculum for rural teachers, I am quite certain the question will be considered.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I did not understand the Vice-President to make any reply to the representations of my hon. friend the Member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool with reference to the loss which will be inflicted on certain schools in Liverpool by the Block Grant. I should like to ask whether any consideration is to be given to these schools, and whether the Vice-President will consider the local situation which has arisen.

SIR J. GORST: I cannot hold out any prospect of the scheme being now altered, but the case of the Liverpool schools shall be very carefully watched. On a former occasion I pointed out that the School Board of Liverpool could very easily make good any loss sustained, by a very small fractional rate. With regard to the Voluntary schools in Liverpool, no doubt the new Block Grant will be a great gain to Voluntary schools generally, and the number of schools now receiving subsidies from the Special Aid Grant will also be very much benefited, and they might very well spare a part of their gain to make good the loss from which a few schools will suffer. I have now the figures relating to the Eastbourne school. The rent is £76, and the voluntary contributions for maintenance £290.

Vote agreed to.

2. £86,280, to complete the sum for British Museum.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.), who stood at the Table, said: I presume there is no objection to my enjoying the luxury once in a way of speaking from this position, especially as the legitimate Opposition appear to be taking a holiday. I desire to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he would be good enough to explain to the Committee, and especially to the Irish Members, the position which the question of the Irish gold ornaments now in the British Museum occupies. I do not think there is any necessity to go into the history of the circumstances connected with these ornaments, but I may say, for the benefit of hon. Members not acquainted with the question, that some years ago a very valuable discovery was made in the north of Ireland of certain antique Irish gold ornaments of great value in themselves and of much greater value because of their historic interest. These ornaments were discovered by quite a poor man, and he sold them, as I understand, to a Mr. Day, who re-sold them to the trustees of the British Museum for a sum of £600 or thereabouts. The noble Lord the Member for Chorley Division of Lancashire stated quite truly that there is in Dublin a museum which, in some respects, is one of the best in the world, and especially with regard to ancient Irish objects the museum is most perfect. It is felt not only by the authorities of the museum in Dublin, but by all classes of the Irish public, that the proper place for these ornaments would be in that museum, for several reasons. In the first place, these ornaments are of great interest to the people of Ireland, who will have no opportunity of seeing them if they are to remain in the British Museum, and, in the second place, the museum in Dublin contains the most perfect collection of Irish ornaments in the world, and therefore we consider it would be most suitable if the latest find were also deposited there. When this question was brought before the House of Commons by me some years ago it was received with the utmost sympathy by hon. Members of all parties, and the First Lord of the Treasury expressed the greatest sympathy with the desire of the Irish Members to have these ornaments deposited in the Dublin Museum. Other members of the Government, the Members for Trinity College, or, at any rate, one of them, and various representatives from Ireland, also expressed a similar view. Then we were told that the British Museum had no power to part with anything it possessed. I introduced a small Bill for the simple purpose of giving the trustees of the British Museum power to transfer these ornaments to the museum in Dublin, but, directly there was a prospect of the Bill getting through, the trustees changed their ground and made it perfectly clear that they did not intend to part with these ornaments, notwithstanding the strong feeling expressed in the House of Commons that they ought to be deposited in the Dublin Museum. Then the Government appointed a small Committee to inquire into all the circumstances of the case. I was not a member of that Committee, but my hon. friend the Member for West Kerry was, and the result of that inquiry was that, if at all possible, these ornaments should be restored to Ireland, and the Committee laid down the principle that similar finds should, as far as possible, be deposited in the Dublin Museum. How does the case stand now? I am informed that the Law Officers both of Ireland and England have expressed the opinion that the British Museum has no right to the custody of these ornaments, for the simple reason that they are really in the nature of treasure trove, that there was no right to sell them, and that the whole transaction was illegal and unwarrantable. That is the position at the present time. These ornaments, having been found in Ireland, naturally belong to the Dublin Museum. The First Lord of the Treasury is in favour of having them restored; the Committee appointed by the Government have practically reported in favour of their restoration; and the Law Officers of both Ireland and England have given the opinion that the trustees of the British Museum have no right to them and that they were illegally acquired. In face of all these circumstances, I ask, is it not unreasonable and unwarrantable that the trustees of the British Museum should set themselves up against the Report of the Committee, against the opinion of the First Lord of the Treasury and the Law Officers for both Ireland and England, and the universal sentiment expressed in this House? The Secretary to the Treasury will correct me if I have misstated the case, but I do not think I have. No one had a right to sell these ornaments; they are illegally in the possession of the British Museum, and what action is to be taken? I am told that the British Museum authorities take up the position that they do not care a snap about the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, and I ask the Secretary to the Treasury, if the facts be as I have stated them, what action does the Government propose in order to enforce the opinion of its own Law Officers. If it be necessary to introduce a Bill to restore these ornaments to Ireland and the Dublin Museum, will the Government introduce such a Bill, or support a Bill if I or any other Irish Member introduce it? And if they will not proceed by way of legislation in this House, I ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, who, as I have stated, is in sympathy with the Irish Members in regard to this question— [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR at this point entered the House.] I am rather sorry that the right hon. Gentleman was not here during the brief statement I have made; but it is unnecessary for me to do more than to remind him that the Committee which he appointed reported practically in favour of the restoration of the ornaments to Ireland. It is unnecessary for me to mention that the Law Officers of the Crown reported that these ornaments were treasure trove, and that no one had any right to sell them to the British Museum. I was just asking what steps the Government intend to take to enforce the opinion of their own Law Officers and restore these illegally obtained ornaments to Ireland and the Dublin Museum. I understand that the authorities of the British Museum have said that they are not satisfied with the mere opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, but want the case to be decided by a court of law. What means have we of obtaining the opinion of a court of law, and what action are we to take to enforce the opinion of the Law Officers of the right hon. Gentleman's own Government, and to secure that these ornaments, which have been taken in an illegal manner by the British Museum, should be restored to Ireland and placed in the Dublin Museum? Some people may say that this is a small matter, but the Irish Members of every shade of opinion most earnestly desire to have these ornaments, so as to complete the very fine collection of Irish antiquities in Dublin. Certainly the First Lord of the Treasury cannot accuse us of any want of patience in this matter, and I confidently appeal to him now to give us some hope that the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown will be enforced, and that these ornaments, after their long and adventurous career in this country and in Ireland, from the time that they were found, may be at length deposited in the museum at Dublin, where all such similar ornaments are now held in national trust and placed on view.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I wish to add my congratulations to the hon. Gentleman on his accession to the position at that box, which has been deserted by the Leader of the Opposition. I think his appearance at the box does him credit, and he bemeans himself with that dignity which we find on all front benches.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: You may be there yourself some day.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: That's as may be. I would ask the hon. Gentleman to be content with something like a compromise. There is a Vote of £600 for autotype copies. Cannot the hon. Member do with an autotype copy?

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: No, no! From the very outset of the controversy the authorities of the British Museum offered to give us facsimile imitations of these ornaments, but such an idea was scoffed at. We say, "Let the originals be deposited in the Dublin Museum; the facsimiles will do very well for the British Museum."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: The original claim seems to be a very good one. This Vote is levied from the United Kingdom, and when ornaments, works of art, or whatever they may be, are purchased, they ought to be placed in the most appropriate part of the United Kingdom, and the appropriate part in this case is Dublin. As to the question of law, it is said that the British Museum cannot part with these things without an Act of Parliament. I believe the same is said about old newspapers. I am informed that in a few years time no human being will be able to move about in the British Museum for these old newspapers, and the trustees have been compelled to introduce a Bill into Parliament to enable them to burn the old copies of Truth. There is a difficulty, but it may be got over. The British Museum can surely part with these gems on payment. [AN HON. MEMBER: No, no!] Is it pretended that the British Museum cannot sell anything? There is, however, another way out of the difficulty; it might buy the gems from itself. It has a grant of £5,800; and no questions would be asked if it paid out of that grant £600 for the gems, buying them from itself. Having recouped itself for what they had paid for the gems, let the British Museum present them to Dublin. I think it is a mean thing that we should hold on by these Irish gems, the proper place for which is undoubtedly Dublin. If it be true that the sale of the gems to the British Museum is illegal, being treasure trove, the British Museum is in the position of being a receiver of stolen goods; and that is not a position in which the trustees of that great national institution should stand. I cannot believe that any legal difficulty exists, and therefore I do trust that Her Majesty's Government will be able to find some means of restoring these gems to Ireland, to which they properly belong.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): It seems convenient for me to deal with this question without delay. The hon. Gentleman who opened this discussion stated, with perfect truth, that there is a very strong feeling in Ireland upon this subject which is not confined to one section or one class of the population. The hon. Gentleman was also perfectly accurate in saying that the matter has now hung on from month to month and from year to year, and is not even at this late hour finally settled. Some hon. Gentlemen seem to be under the impression that the obstacle in the way of the British Museum restoring these gold ornaments to Ireland or to Dublin is a legal disability under which the museum finds itself of getting rid of any property which it has acquired. That legal disability is complete as regards anything which has lawfully come into the possession of the museum, and it would require nothing less than an Act of Parliament to compel the British Museum to give up anything of which it was the lawful possessor, however strong the reason of policy or justice might be which might induce such giving up or such destruction, as in the case of the newspapers to which my hon. friend the Member for King's Lynn referred. But, as I understand, that legal disability does not arise in this case. The Law Officers both of England and Ireland have had the case submitted to them and have come to the conclusion that these ornaments were treasure trove and belonged to the Crown, and that the person who found the ornaments, not being the legal possessor of them, had therefore no right to transfer them to the British Museum for payment, to sell them in fact, and consequently the museum is not now the legal owner of them. There is clearly no difficulty in the way of the museum restoring property which is not its own to those to whom it belongs. But the museum, as I understand the matter, is not prepared to accept the verdict of the Law Officers of either England or Ireland. I do not know what has induced the trustees to throw doubt upon such high legal authorities. I do not criticise their action, and certainly I do not mean to justify it. It is not my province to adopt the rôle either of critic or defender of the trustees, but I am disposed to think that as they constantly appeal to the Law Officers for advice in legal matters, they might trust their decision in this case, even though it is not agreeable to them. If there is no other way of settling the matter, I presume an appeal will have to be made to the courts of law, but that would be a course which I would greatly regret. The hon. Gentleman opposite asked, if the trustees of the British Museum maintain the attitude they have taken, what facilities he or his friends had for bringing an action. I do not think it ought to be left to private individuals to do that. I think that the Government must take on themselves the responsibility of asking a court of law to give a decision on the point, provided there be no other means of coming to a satisfactory conclusion of the matter. It is quite evident that we cannot acquiesce in the continuance of the present state of things. The Law Officers have informed the Government that the trustees of the British Museum are in the wrong, and I express the earnest hope that they will see their way to retire from a position which I believe is wholly untenable, without arousing that friction and unpleasantness which cannot be disassociated from even a friendly action taken in the law courts.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to express the gratitude which I and the other Irish Members feel at the attitude which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has taken in this matter. The reply which he has given will be received with great satisfaction throughout Ireland.

LORD BALCARRES said he only wished to point out that the Royal Irish Academy had shown great supineness in this matter. They knew for months that these articles had been found, and that they had been publicly exhibited in London, but they never moved. They were a public body receiving large sums from the British Treasury, and it was their duty to watch over treasure trove. They had a perfect legal remedy in their hands, and a right to take action against the finder. He was opposed to the transfer of these things which the hon. Member for King's Lynn called gems, although they were gold collars, etc., as the trustees of the British Museum were backed by the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, and did not accept that of the Law Officers of the Crown. Hon. Members opposite had a magnificent museum in Dublin. It was a case for generosity on the part of Ireland more than on the part of England. These articles were of far greater value to science and art in London than in Dublin. There was only one single object in this find of which specimens of three and four times the value did not exist in Dublin. As the specimens were treasure trove, no doubt they would be taken out of the British Museum and transferred to Dublin, and many people would greatly regret the transfer. But there was another question which arose—a question of principle quite apart from treasure trove—and that was whether local interests were to take precedence of national interests in these matters. In his opinion, in the British Museum everything British should be represented, and the Royal Irish Academy which had displayed the most extraordinary apathy in this matter, might at least compromise with the British Museum to the extent of leaving them one or more specimens.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said he did not desire to go further into the matter, although the noble Lord opposite had made some rather curious remarks. The noble Lord was closely connected with one of the trustees of the British Museum, and the Committee had listened to a speech delivered ostensibly by the noble Lord, but really by the trustee. Was there really anything in this contention that, because the collection of antique Celtic ornaments existing in Dublin was a fine one, it should not be strengthened by the latest finds? One complete collection in Dublin would be much better than partial collections in different places. Supposing there was a great find of antique objects of extraordinary interest to this country and they were transferred to the Dublin Museum, what would be the result? The idea was preposterous. As regarded the charge of apathy brought against the Royal Irish Academy, it never occurred to them that these ornaments would be sold to the British Museum, or, if they were, that the trustees would refuse to restore to Ireland objects discovered in Ireland, and naturally of most interest to the Irish people. He thought it would only be a graceful act to restore them.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) asked where this system of restitution was to end. Was the British Museum to be pledged to restore the objects we had got from Athens to Athens, and those which we had got from Egypt to Egypt? For the sake of all who were interested in archaeology, these antiquities ought to be in the British Museum. He hoped that if it ever came to a question in the House of Commons, an opportunity would be given of showing by vote whether Members believed that the British Museum ought to be forced to give up what was now in its possession—and of infinite value to the public in its possession—and hand it over to Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It does not belong to them.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said the collection was in the British Museum. If—as was contended—it belonged to the Crown, the Crown ought to give it to the British Museum.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said the question had been so narrowed down that it became a mere question of whether the British Museum was in possession of property which had been stolen or not. If the Lord Chancellor accepted the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and decided that this property belonged to the Crown, he thought the Crown would be showing an ungenerous spirit not to give it back to Ireland. But inasmuch as a legal decision in the matter must be arrived at by the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers of the Crown before anything could be done, the Committee could do nothing more in the matter at present.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) was of opinion that the ornaments in question were either treasure trove or property which had been properly acquired by the British Museum. If they had been properly acquired then the British Museum had a right to keep them. If they were treasure trove they could dispose of them or not as they thought fit. It was ungenerous to a degree to suggest that these ornaments should be transferred to Dublin Museum, which already had a unique collection. He protested against the notion that because these were Irish works of art they should be all kept in Dublin. If Dublin had no specimens, or the specimens which they possessed were poor, by all means let them have the best; but the Dublin collection was a better collection than all these things put together, and it seemed to him that we certainly ought to have a collection like this in London. It was to him a most extraordinary thing for the First Lord of the Treasury to make the offer which he had made. If these ornaments were the property of the Crown, the proper thing to say would be that a fair selection of them should be deposited in London. If once the suggestion of distributing these things among the places from which they came were acted upon, the British Museum would cease to exist. By all means let Ireland have the best collection, but let also a fair collection remain in England. He did not think it would be fair to allow the whole of these ornaments to be sent to Dublin.

*MR. LECKY (Dublin University) said he believed there was no subject on which Irish archaeological opinion had felt more strongly than this. The Academy in Dublin was a great centre to which from all over the world people went to study Irish antiquities. It was evident that there had been some neglect in Ireland, otherwise the objects in question would never have gone to the British Museum, but seeing that the Law Officers of the Crown thought that the British Museum had no right to keep them and that the feeling in Ireland was against it, he most sincerely hoped that the British Museum would take the advice of the First Lord of the Treasury and give them up.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Now may I bring to the attention of the Committee another item. It is a question of account. I find in this Vote an item of £5,800, a grant-in-aid. I do not quarrel with the amount of the grant or the application of it, and I do not think, having regard to the importance of it, that it is excessive. But I think the expenditure of the £5,800 should be left to the British Museum, and no surrender should be made of any balance which is left, because if the British Museum were allowed to retain it they might be able to purchase objects of art which they could not otherwise hope to obtain. Neither do I comprehend the necessity of the grant being audited by the Comptroller and Auditor General. I say you have no right to audit these accounts. No one is a greater scrupler than I am for auditing, but it is ridiculous to have these accounts audited by the Comptroller and Auditor General. Nevertheless if the Committee will look at the bottom of page 368 they will see that the expenditure out of the grant-in-aid is subject to the audit of the Comptroller and Auditor General, but there is to be no surrendering of the money. If you are not going to surrender anything what is the use of the audit? I should like an answer to that question. It is absurd when you vote a large sum to the British Museum that it should be an out-and-out grant, and that there should be no power to compel any redistribution of the money, nor any return to the Treasury if nothing has been done of the unexpended balances. In that case why should you go on having the accounts audited by the Comptroller and Auditor General?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): What really happens in regard to this Vote is this. Up to 1896 if the money was not expended the balance had to be returned to the Treasury. The result was not to induce the trustees of the British Museum to save a large sum, but to fritter away the money on things that might turn out to be not of sufficient value or importance. That being so, the system was altered, and now they receive grants-in-aid, but they are not required to return any of the unexpended money. The balance which has not been used can be devoted to the purpose in succeeding years. That being so, the Comptroller and Auditor General is called in because his audit enables Parliament to retain some control over the expenditure, and, in fact, to see how the money has been spent. It is simply by acting in that way that the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons has some check upon the expenditure.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (Wiltshire, Cricklade): This point has arisen with regard to the National Portrait Gallery, of which I am a trustee. Previous to 1896 the object of the British Museum and the National Portrait Gallery was to try to use the money voted each year as wisely as they could. The system was altered in that year with excellent results. The matter was gone into by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it was recognised to be absolutely necessary that the Treasury should have some knowledge of what the balances were when carried forward. It is rather astonishing to hear my hon. friend objecting to the Comptroller and Auditor General being brought in.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: The noble Lord has entirely misapprehended my position. I am an advocate of giving a lump sum. I approve of that. The noble Lord says the Treasury knows what is being done. I do not care twopence what the Treasury knows. The Comptroller and Auditor General is an independent officer of this House, and he is a person whose interference is wholly unnecessary after you have settled the principle of giving an out-and-out grant either to the British Museum or the National Portrait Gallery.

SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan): Will you allow me to say that when we had the inquiry about the South Kensington Museum, exactly the same question arose? We carefully investigated the whole subject, and came to the conclusion that the regulations which have been made in regard to the grant are thoroughly sound and wise. Under the new system we are not compelled to spend the whole of the money in the same year. At the same time, I think Parliament ought to exercise some control of a general character in the way of supervising the expenditure. That provision is made by means of the audit, and I believe it is carried out in a wise and sound manner.

Vote agreed to.

3. £8,374, to complete the sum for National Gallery.

4. £2,520, to complete the sum for National Portrait Gallery.

5. £4,967, to complete the sum for Wallace Collection.

6. £35,724, to complete the sum for Scientific Investigation, etc.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I wish to call attention to the grant-in-aid of £1,000 to the Marine Biological Association. I do not complain of this grant; on the contrary, what I desire to advocate is that the grant to this association, which, to put it in a popular form, is an association for the study of the habits of sea fish, should be very largely increased with the view to the better study of sea-fish life. The ignorance of sea-fish life in this country is almost incredible, and hence we have presumptuous Presidents of the Board of Trade introducing nefarious Bills to regulate the size of fish that are to be sold. Nobody can tell why fish are here one year and away the next. We ought to do in this country what the United States have done, and erect a permanent institution for the study of the habits of sea-fish life. That is done to a very large extent in the United States. Tens of thousands of pounds are spent every year, and the result has been the accumulation of a large amount of useful knowledge. We can do little with this miserable contribution of £1,000 to a semi-private association. They have an establishment at Plymouth. They keep a kind of show or aquarium to which the public are admitted, and they prosecute to a very small extent, but I believe with great energy and ability, the investigation of the habits of fish. It is in consequence of the ignorance prevailing in this country on the subject that you have to measure and say the size of fish that may be sold. It is absurd to say that we know enough of the sole, or any other fish, to indicate the number of inches they ought to be before being sold. I have been a sufferer from the ignorance of Presidents of the Board of Trade in connection with a measure which I have hitherto successfully resisted. The right hon. Gentleman may be able to pass it over my head this year. I feel that some stand ought to be made against the dark ignorance that prevails on this subject, especially upon the Treasury Bench. There is only one way of becoming acquainted with the habits of sea fish, and that is by studying them. This is a good beginning. This society is a good society. They have published some very remarkable pamphlets, characterised by so ripe judgment that I have been able to quote their remarks against the Undersized Fish Bill. If that is so, do not be content with giving them a beggarly £1,000. In this marine fish inquiry launch out with a generous hand, so that a larger number of scientific men may engage in the investigation of the habits of sea fish. Have a certain number of vessels engaged in trawling in the sea in pursuit of knowledge of that kind, and then you will be in a position, which I hold you are not in now, to propose legislation which will be useful to fishermen and to the community generally. I wish to ask whether the Treasury intend to proceed on this entirely inadequate system of making a very small contribution to a small semi-private society of £1,000 a year, or whether they are prepared to consider the extremely important nature of the problems involved in the acquisition of a knowledge of fish, and also whether they are prepared to entertain the idea of setting up an establishment like that in the United States, which will enable them to get a fuller and more accurate knowledge of the habits of sea fish.

LORD BALCARRES: The Vote includes a sum of £7,000 as a grant in aid of the cost of building and equipping the National Physical Laboratory. The Secretary of the Treasury has promised to receive a deputation representing those who believe that a more suitable site than that selected for the buildings could be found. I should like an assurance from my right hon. friend that the voting of this sum of £7,000 does not in any way bind him or the Treasury to adhere to the site that is proposed, and that if the deputation can persuade him that a more suitable site could be found elsewhere, he will not be prevented by this from accepting their view. We do not wish to be met with the answer that the money has been voted and nothing can be done. I might appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury to continue some grant-in-aid, if only for a reduced amount, to the British School at Athens. It is a most interesting work that is being done, and I think there are many people in this country who will show warm sympathy with the right hon. Gentleman if he should be successful in continuing this grant.

MR. HANBURY: With regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for King's Lynn, I think he is under some misapprehension when he supposes that this is the only grant-in-aid for scientific purposes. As a matter of fact we give a grant to the Scottish Fishery Board for the purpose of scientific investigation, and similar assistance is given to the Irish fisheries. I am not aware whether any further sum is given for scientific investigation in England. The association has already a larger income than it spends, and under present conditions there does not seem to be any urgent necessity to increase the grant of £1,000 a year. In regard to the Physical Laboratory, which has been referred to by my noble friend behind me, the Treasury, after all, have had very little voice in the matter. We acted entirely on the recommendation of the Committee of the Royal Society. It was absolutely necessary to find a spot near Kew Observatory, where this laboratory is proposed to be situated. After looking at every possible site, they reported that no other site would answer the purpose so well as this one which adjoins Kew Gardens. I quite agree with my noble friend that nothing ought to be done that would interfere with the amenities of Kew Gardens, and I think he will see when he looks at the plans that this has been considered. One is a building for machinery, and the other is a building for carrying on the more delicate scientific operations. The former does not interfere with the amenities of the place. It is entirely out of view of Kew Gardens. It is placed in a corner surrounded by trees, far away from the Queen's Cottage and its surroundings. The other building is placed nearer the Queen's Cottage, but it will be surrounded by trees. It will be in a position that will not interfere with the view, and, of course, it is not a building that will be entered by many people, as the machinery building will be. It will be confined to a few scientific people, and in no sense a building that will interfere with the amenities of the Gardens. That is the information I have at the present moment, but I do not wish to anticipate what my noble friend may have to say when I receive the deputation. I can give him the promise that the voting of the sum of £7,000 will in no way prejudice the case.

*MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.): In regard to the archaeological research in connection with the school at Athens, I do not think the money expended has been creditable to this country when it is compared with the work done by other countries. If it is a fact that the grant is to be reduced or withdrawn—I was not aware of it—I hope we shall have some explanation of the grounds on which that decision has been taken. Possibly the right hon. Gentleman will be able to hold out some hope that such a retrograde step will be reconsidered, and that he will continue to subscribe this miserable pittance towards the great work of archaeology.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: While I have had no opportunity to consult the authorities of the Treasury or the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this point, I imagine that the only ground for the alarm expressed is that the original grant for the British School at Athens is for five years, and that this term is drawing to a close. Nothing has been said in this House, as I understand, as to the possibility of renewal. The matter has never been under consideration. It has never been brought under my notice. The whole question of Government subvention of scientific investigation is a very important subject, and there is no doubt that this country has, from a traditional policy, lagged greatly behind other nations in this respect. It never occurs to us to do what the Germans, the French, or even what our cousins in America have done in making certain grants for investigations; and whether we are right or wrong I do not pretend to say. My own personal inclination is rather in the direction of Governmental aid in cases where you can hardly expect private aid to come forward; but at the same time I confess that I often think how strange it is in a very rich country like ours there are not found some people who, in a difficulty to find other and more profitable investments, do not attempt to earn glory for themselves by carrying on these investigations with the money that is required. I can only say that certainly the grant will not be discontinued without full consideration of the facts and interests involved.

Vote agreed to.

7. £67,500, to complete the sum for Universities and Colleges, Great Britain, and Intermediate Education, Wales.

*SIR F. S. POWELL: I wish to appeal to the Government to exercise a more generous policy towards the colleges and universities of England. The contrast between the amounts of the grants to two English universities, and to the University of Wales is, I think, not fair to the English universities. I am a member of the Court of the Victoria University, and therefore have some knowledge of the action taken by that university and of its proceedings. I do hope the Government will have some regard to the services rendered both to education and to science by the Victoria University. This is a new university, it has all the vigour, all the strength, and all the hope of youth, and I feel myself no doubt that in coming years, if the supplies granted by this House are equal to the occasion, it will perform a most distinguished part in the technical, classical, and highest culture of this country. If that be the case as regards the Victoria University I think it is as true as regards the university colleges. I can speak from an intimate knowledge of the services of the Yorkshire College at Leeds. That institution is greatly hampered for want of a larger grant. There was an inquiry some years ago conducted by highly scientific men who investigated the position and comparative claims of these university colleges. The sum assigned to the Yorkshire College at Leeds is entirely inadequate to its wants. We have by private gifts and the liberality of the city companies largely extended our buildings, our apparatus, and our plans. The inquiry which took place some years ago pointed to the fact that our buildings were not adequate to the work we desired to do. Since that time these buildings have been increased by private benefactions and by the magnificent gifts of the public companies, but we are still unable to perform the duties we are called upon to discharge. We have extended our education in agriculture, we have still further improved our arrangements for instruction in textiles, and we are hoping to raise that great industry to a condition more in accordance with the wants of the country and the importance of that pursuit. I trust the appeal I am making to-day will not be in vain, and that when the next occasion comes for a revision of these grants greater liberality will be exercised. I am not in a position to speak from personal knowledge of Owen's College, Manchester, but the information has been forthcoming from distinguished members of the controlling staff that they are suffering from the same difficulties that we experience in Yorkshire. I certainly hope, as we have had larger aid from the Government for elementary and technical education, that like generosity will be shown to our universities and university colleges. It is useless for this or any other country to improve the elementary and secondary education except the higher culture also is improved. It is by the constant development of the higher departments of education that the lower departments continue to prosper, and if the improvement of the higher departments ceases, decay must ensue in the lower departments. I am grateful to the committee for allowing me to make this representation on behalf of the Council, and I hope the time will come when my words will prove to have been spoken not in vain.

MR. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I most heartily sympathise with the wish expressed that this grant should be increased, and I desire to raise a point which is perhaps closely connected with such possible increase. I believe the £25,000 a year which is divided between the specified colleges in Great Britain is allocated in accordance with the Treasury Minute of June, 1897, which, after considerable inquiry, distributed certain sums to various university colleges, allocating the money to them for a period of five years, on the understanding that the question should be again investigated and reported on before the end of that period. As the time is running out, I should be glad to know what are the intentions of the Government with respect to this investigation, and as to the way in which they intend, or expect, or wish that the claims and views of the different university colleges should be brought forward. It is important that these bodies should be heard before such an inquiry. Some difficulty has arisen in the past because these bodies have not been adequately heard. The point with regard to which I wish to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman is one that affects the University College of Dundee, in the well-being of which, in my capacity as rector of the University of St. Andrews, I am very personally interested. My reason for raising the matter is that there has been an irregularity and a want of continuity of action in respect of the University College of Dundee such as has not taken place with respect to any other of these institutions which are now under consideration. The University College of Dundee was started on exactly the same footing as university colleges in England. When this sum came to be given to university colleges a small grant of £500 was given to Dundee, and even that was not obtained without some considerable difficulty. £500 a year is a very much smaller sum than is given to the colleges in England, and one of the reasons then alleged is a reason which I trust the right hon. Gentleman will not allege now—namely, that the universities of Scotland receive a large grant from the Treasury. They do receive a large grant from the Treasury—a grant of £42,000 a year; they also receive a portion of the Probate Duty in the same way as a portion is devoted to secondary education in England. But let me remind the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee that that is done in accordance with the Act of Union between England and Scotland. While the Scotch provided for the maintenance of the castles of Stirling and Dunbar in good repair, they also had the good sense to insist upon adequate provision being made under the Act of Union from the Treasury of Great Britain for the maintenance of the universities. We may, therefore, put aside that portion which is given to the Scotch universities as being any reasonable argument against classifying the town of Dundee with other towns like Nottingham, Sheffield, and the like, which participate in this grant. Dundee stands exactly towards the University College of Dundee as Sheffield stands towards its college or as Newcastle stands towards the Newcastle College of Physical Science. The College of Physical Science in Newcastle is partly endowed by the University of Durham, as the college in Dundee is now partly endowed from the University of St. Andrews; there is no difference in character between them. As I say, £500 was given to the University College of Dundee. In 1894 that small grant was withdrawn, and it was not renewed until 1897, when there was a second investigation and a second distribution. It was then renewed at the figure of £1,000 a year, at which amount it has continued since. But why that change? Why that irregularity of action? It is not because of that irregularity of action in the past that I wish to make any complaint, but because of the difficulty which is introduced into the management of the University of St. Andrews and the University College of Dundee—of whose managing body I am president—by the uncertainty of action I have endeavoured to bring before the right hon. Gentleman. Why was the grant dropped in 1894? Here is the Report of the Committee to the Treasury, which Report was adopted in the Treasury Minute of 1894—

“Your Committee do not recommend that a grant should be made to the University College of Dundee, inasmuch as they consider that that College, being now part of the University of St. Andrews, has been withdrawn from the scope of the present grant, and will participate in future in the increased grant for Scotch universities.”

quence of which the grant was dropped. There arose between 1894 and 1897 considerable doubt as to whether or not the University College of Dundee was incorporated in the University of St. Andrews. The matter was the subject of litigation, and the echoes of the contest still remain. I do not think they are fated to remain very long, nor do I say the subject is absolutely decided at this moment. Let us see what was done in consequence of the existence of that doubt. The Treasury Minute of June 2nd, referring to or acting upon the advice of the eminent scientific authorities to whom reference has just been made, reads as follows—

“My Lords take note of the terms of the Committee's Report with regard to the Dundee College.”

That was a Report recommending a grant—“In acceding to the Committee's recommendation that for the present”

—those words are underlined—

“the College should receive £100 a year my Lords are guided, as they understand the Committee to have been guided, by the exceptional position in which the College is now placed.”

The “exceptional position” which I have tried to describe is one of doubt as to whether it is incorporated or not with the University of St. Andrews.

“My Lords are of opinion that when the relations between the University and the College are settled this matter should be subject to reconsideration, and they must not be understood to admit the claim of the College to share permanently in the grant for University Colleges.”

If those two Minutes mean anything, they at any rate run the risk of meaning that when the University College of Dundee is working harmoniously with the University of St. Andrews it shall then be mulcted to the extent of £1,000 a year. Is that a very hopeful prospect to hold out to one who, like myself, in the position I occupy with respect to these two bodies, is earnestly anxious to bring about a happy co-operation? It is really, so far as it goes, though I do not say it is made as such, an absolute bribe to disagree. What I want to point out is that when we are endeavouring to bring together the ancient University of St. Andrews—a university which has a more glorious history than almost any other educational institution in Great Britain, and certainly the most notable educational history of any such institution in Scotland—and the modern School of Science in Dundee, as an Act of Parliament has declared they should be brought together, it is extremely undesirable there should be hanging about the whole action this uncertainty as to the grant. It will not do to say that the University College of Dundee is getting an unlimited share of the grant to the Scotch colleges. It is strictly limited so that it cannot receive more than a certain amount, and that amount—which is £3,000—is in comparison with the general endowments of other colleges no large figure. Therefore I do earnestly hope we shall get some assurance that the University College of Dundee will not be treated in the spirit of the first of these two Minutes, and because of its incorporation, when it is brought about finally and completely, with the University of St. Andrews, deprived of the grant it is enjoying just now. The Committee must also remember that the University College of Dundee is doing a work with which the University of St. Andrews has nothing to do. The University College of Dundee is certainly part of and incorporated with the University of St. Andrews, but, on the other hand, it does a large amount of local technical and evening work which does not prepare people for a degree in a university and is absolutely comparable with the evening work of the University College of Nottingham, all of which work is part of the recommendation of such colleges to the enjoyment of the grant. One other point which I wish to bring before the right hon. Gentleman is that of this £25,000 a year which is divided between the university colleges of England on the one hand, and this one college in Scotland on the other, only £1,000 goes to Scotland. You are giving to the university colleges of Wales—and I am glad you are; do not think I grudge it at all—the sum of £12,000 a year; you are giving to those in England £24,000, the two sums together amounting to £36,000 a year; you are giving to the University College of Dundee £1,000 a year, and that is the whole amount that goes to Scotland. I know, as I have said before, that the Scotch universities have a grant, but it is in virtue of the Act of Union. Remember, too, that the educational ambitions of the Scotch nation are very great and worthy, and that they have done so much for the nation. It is well that they should be supported in a way which is in no sense pauperising, but which will not only assist those who have assisted themselves, but actually help forward the union of the University College of Dundee and the University of St. Andrews, and it is extremely desirable in every way that we should see ancient traditions united with modern institutions. Let the right hon. Gentleman not think there need be any difficulty in carrying out the allocation of this money to the right purposes. All I would say in conclusion is that I do earnestly press it on the right hon. Gentleman and the Government that they should give an assurance that when they again consider this matter such persons as represent the University of St. Andrews and the University College of Dundee and other bodies will be enabled to lay before the Treasury their views in the matter. I earnestly hope that this matter may be decided at an early date, so that this sword of Damocles may no longer hang over this young institution in Dundee. Everyone knows that when you have to draw up a programme of studies, erect laboratories, and so on, the uncertainty as to whether a grant of £1,000 will or will not be continued is a very serious drawback to all the work you are undertaking, affecting with uncertainty and insecurity a great many more steps in connection with the college than are affected by the mere sum of £1,000 a year. On behalf of the university which I so inadequately represent at the present moment, and of the University College of Dundee, knowing how closely it is related to the other university colleges in England, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take into very careful consideration the remarks I have ventured to make.

SIR J. LENG (Dundee): As one of the representatives of Dundee and a member of the college council, I desire to express my indebtedness to the Lord Rector of St. Andrews University for the clear manner in which he has put before the Committee the case for the Dundee University College. There is reason for taking this course, inasmuch as my hon. friend has referred to the fact that in the year 1894, when the members of the college council had no opportunity of being heard, they were astonished to find that the very small grant of £500 was recommended to be withdrawn. It is, therefore, desirable that when this question comes to be reconsidered under the terms of the Minute of 1897, the representative of the Dundee University College shall have an opportunity of being heard. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that out of the £25,000 the almost microscopic grant of £500 was made in the first instance to Dundee, and yet this ewe lamb, as one may call it, was roughly slain and the grant taken away. My hon. friend's contention is that in equity Dundee has as strong a claim to have its grant continued, and not only continued, but increased, as any town in England. The college in Dundee is a comparatively modern institution. It was founded by the great generosity of a family of merchant princes. As time went on it was found necessary to increase the number of chairs, and others of the merchant princes of Dundee gave sums varying from £6,000 to £12,000 to bring the chairs up to date and the requirements of the time. Dundee has therefore done its part. Nearly £200,000 has been given within the last twenty years by those who have made their wealth in Dundee in order to secure that the young people of all classes may have the advantage of this local college, in connection with which there is an excellent technical institute, the classes of which are overflowing. The buildings are not large enough to hold the hundreds of intelligent youths and artisans who desire to attend these classes night after night. If there is any town in the kingdom which has done its duty by the poor and the working classes it is Dundee, and the fact that it has helped itself is a strong claim, if any claim is to be made on the Treasury, that at least it should be dealt with on the same conditions as the colleges of England. The terms of the grant which is now before the House are for university colleges in "Great Britain," and Scotland is part of Great Britain. At present, Scotland is receiving only £1,000 out of £25,000, and there have been threatenings that it should be deprived of even that. If there was any serious intention to that effect I am sure it would be protested against throughout the whole of the country north of the Tweed. Without enlarging upon what my hon. friend has so well placed before the Committee, I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will give an assurance that when this question is reconsidered the representatives of the college shall be fully heard, and that the grant shall not, at any rate, be diminished.

MR. ALLAN (Gateshead): I had no intention whatever of taking any part in this debate over the University College of Dundee, but I can speak with some degree of feeling upon this question, seeing that I am a Dundee man, and have witnessed the growth of education in Dundee more or less for over half a century. That we should be discussing in this House to-night the paltry sum of £1,000 for the University College of Dundee is something remarkable to me. I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman sitting on the Treasury Bench has never been in Dundee; I do not think he knows what Dundee is, or how that great manufacturing town has grown. I have seen it when it was very small, and I have seen it now it is very large, and the right hon. Gentleman should remember that he is concerned here with one of the principal towns in Scotland as far as manufacturing interests are concerned. It is the centre of the jute industry, of engineering, and of shipbuilding; it produces the best mechanics and engineers that can be found almost anywhere; and the question of a paltry £1,000 for the University College should never be discussed in this House, while there certainly should never be any question as to whether it should be continued. Thousands of young men there attend the night classes and the technical school; they go there after they leave the factory, the machine shop, or the shipyard, in order that they may get a higher education. It is a sorry sight that any Member of this House, or at any rate any Scotch Member, should stand up here, practically with cap in hand, to beg—a word I detest. We have no right to come here and beg for money for the University College of Dundee. We subscribe more than our share to the national wealth, and we have no right whatever to beg for this paltry £1,000. The right hon. Gentleman is always an advocate of progress, and always stands up for the education of the young men of the country. Why, then, should there be any question about this grant? You may say that the St. Andrews grant will suffice for both. Not at all. What the right hon. Gentleman ought to do he knows perfectly well. He should give them £5,000 a year for the purposes of education there, simply from the fact that it is the centre of a great manufacturing industry, and one of the first cities of Scotland in manufactures. But I am not going to beg from the Treasury, for Scotchmen never beg. We stand here and claim our right to a fair share of the wealth of this country to be devoted to education in Scotland. We have no right to come here and beg for the Dundee University College, and why should this £1,000 be taken away from the Dundee College? We ought to have a much larger sum for this college. The Lord Rector of the University knows nothing about Dundee, and I know all about it, and I say there should be no question whatever of giving this money to a young and energetic educational institution. Why rob this college of their little pittance? Such a proposal is not right, it is not fair or honest, and it is not just to Scotland.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid): I am glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is present upon this Vote, because I think there is likely to be a misconception on the part of the Government officials that Scotland is getting a larger sum of money on this Vote than it really is. Here is the sum of £42,000 set down for the Scotch universities, but that sum should never have been on this Vote at all. By the Treaty of Union the Universities of Scotland were to be placed upon the Imperial Exchequer, and in order to discharge that burden the Exchequer got the whole of the Scotch estates. It was part of the Treaty of Union that the universities of Scotland were to be kept up at the national expense. That was a part of the bargain, and it continued until a few years ago, up to which time the whole expense of the Scotch universities were born upon the Imperial estimates. But what took place a few years ago? The Government tried to get rid of this responsibility, which was bestowed upon them by the Treaty of Union, of contributing this £42,000 a year for the Scotch universities. What did they do when they came to treat the equivalent grants between Scotland and Ireland? A sum of £30,000 was taken out of the money from Scotland, and given in subsidies to Scotch universities which it was the duty and always had been the responsibility of the Government to maintain out of the Imperial purse. You now have this £42,000 paid out of the Imperial funds for Scotch education, and you also have Scotland itself out of its own funds providing £30,000 for the Scotch universities. I venture to say that is an unfair way of getting rid of your obligations under the Treaty of Union. Down to the last few years you had the whole burden of these universities upon the Imperial Exchequer. You cannot wipe off a Treaty of Union by saying, "Here is a few thousand pounds more, and we will wipe you off for the future." What have the Government done? Here is a Unionist Government in power, with a majority of English Members. You have had the Scotch money at your disposal, and you have taken this £30,000 against the votes and the wishes of Scotch Liberal Members out of Scotch money, and you have applied it to discharge what was the duty of the Imperial Government—namely, to keep up the Scotch universities in a manner suitable to the times. If you had done this duty properly you would be paying the whole of the expenses of the St. Andrews University, and you would not have had to come upon Scotland for £30,000. In this way Scotland has been compelled to pay £30,000 a year for something which was an Imperial obligation. You are now adding to these sums the money for England and Wales. It is not very long since this Vote came on to the Paper, and it is since the University Act was passed. The result is that you are giving this new money to England upon the footing that you have already provided for Scotland. But you have done nothing of the kind. You are giving all this money to England, and Scotland is only getting £1,000. I wish also to refer to the College of Science in Glasgow, which is one of the largest attended colleges in the whole kingdom, and is doing admirable work. This college is now getting subsidies out of the grants in aid of the local authorities. This college does not get one single copper out of the Imperial fund. I ask if it is fair that, having an Imperial obligation under the Treaty of Union to keep up the universities of Scotland as a national undertaking; having got all the revenues of the universities upon the condition that you took over the obligation of maintaining these universities, is it fair to come here now and try to get rid of this obligation and take £30,000, by force, out of Scotch money.

Mr. Allan.

I venture to say that that is not a creditable way of dealing with public education in Scotland. When we find that you are giving these grants to England we do not object. We are quite agreeable that England should get these grants, but we do say that Scotland ought to come in for a reasonable share of those grants. We are doing a great work at the College of Science in Glasgow, and we are not getting one single copper for that great work from the Imperial Treasury. In this matter of education we simply ask for justice, and for the discharge of your legal obligation. As regards the future, with reference to these new sums, you should give us an equivalent with England, but do not treat Scotland as having nothing to do with these matters. I am very glad to find the Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen here, for I am sure he will corroborate me when I say that even with the £42,000 from the Imperial Funds and the £30,000 from the Scotch Fund there is not sufficient money to carry on the work of these universities as it ought to be carried on at present. The right hon. Gentleman also knows the valuable work that is done in the College of Science in Glasgow, and that it is entirely by local aid that that institution is being kept up. I hope that before this discussion closes we shall have a few words on this subject from the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. JAMES A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): I cannot refrain from saying that while I do not agree with the hon. Member opposite in all his complaints as to the way in which the Scottish universities have been treated by the Imperial Treasury, I do agree that in Scotland we have a claim to equal treatment with England with regard to the assistance given for new or additional university work. I hope that there is no reason to fear that this grant which has been enjoyed by the University College of Dundee will be withdrawn. I have known something of this college from its beginning, and I am sure that this money is needed there, and that it has been well bestowed upon that college. I am aware of its connection with the University of St. Andrews, and I agree that the effect of that connection does not place the University College of Dundee outside the need of such assistance as it has been receiving. I have no disposition to continue this discussion, which seems to imply some suspicion upon the intentions of my right hon. friend the Secretary to the Treasury, for which I hope there is no justification.

MR. HANBURY: Practically the whole speech of the hon. Member for Mid Lanarkshire was an attack upon recent legislation with regard to the Scotch universities. After all, we must regard that legislation as being in existence, and that being so we must assume that that Act dealt fairly with the amounts which were allocated to these Scotch universities. With regard to the arguments which the hon. Member has raised in reference to this fund belonging to Scotland and being put aside for this purpose under the Act of Union, those are arguments which were no doubt raised when the Act I have alluded to was considered. We have now to deal with the Act as it stands, and under that Act undoubtedly it is a fact that a large sum of money is allocated to these universities. That being so, we are now asked with regard to the University College of Dundee whether we are going to continue this grant of £1,000. We reply—as we replied some time ago—that it is quite impossible that the Dundee college should have the advantage of a grant on its own account, and at the same time receive the advantages which it would derive from the grants made to the University of St. Andrews if it were entirely affiliated to that university. That, I think, is a reasonable ground to take up. If the University College of Dundee was placed in that position it would be different to that of any other college in England or Wales, and I think hon. Members opposite ought to be content with the very reasonable plea put forward by my right hon. friend behind me, that in matters of this kind the colleges in Scotland should be treated in exactly the same way as the colleges in England and Wales. That is a reasonable request, and so far as the colleges in Scotland are entitled to these grants they will be treated in exactly the same way as the colleges in England and Wales are treated. When Dundee College once becomes entirely affiliated with the University of St. Andrews, it will receive all the advantages and endowments which are given to that university, but it cannot expect to have in addition the advantages it is now receiving as a separate college. I understand from the speech of the hon. Member for Hoxton that his complaint is not so much as to the actual amount of the grant, but that he is anxious that the present condition of things should not continue, and that the connection between this college and the University of St. Andrews should take place as soon as possible. What has really happened is this. We have been in communication with the Scotch Office upon this question, and they have told us that as the connection between this college and the university is not yet entirely established we should not be justified in at present removing this £1,000 from the Vote. Until that connection is established this grant will, of course, be continued. My hon. friend the Member for Wigan complained that the sums allocated to these different colleges are not sufficient. I would point out to my hon. friend that towards the end of 1896 a Committee went very carefully through the whole subject, and it was upon the recommendations of that Committee that the Treasury acted, and the sums fixed are entirely in accordance with the recommendations of that Committee. As to the sum of £25,000 not being adequate, I do not think the hon. Member has any right to complain of this, because until two or three years ago the sum granted for the purpose was only £15,000; but in 1896 the sum was raised to £25,000, and that is the sum which will remain up to the year 1901. No doubt a fresh allocation will be made, and fresh claims will be brought in, and if the authorities of Dundee College can establish a fair claim to this grant no doubt their case will be favourably considered by the Treasury. We have now only to deal with the grant for the present year, and all I have to say is that that grant is considerably in advance of the annual grant made three years ago when the sum was only £15,000.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I happen to be officially connected with the University College of Dundee, and it is to that portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech which dealt with that matter that I shall confine myself. I must express my disappointment at the substance of his reply. He has practically told us, notwithstanding the opinion expressed by the Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen, that there is every prospect of this grant being lost, and he has given us the Treasury's reason for it. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the University College of Dundee would be entitled to a continuance of this annual grant of £1,000 if it retained its separate existence, but he says it will not be so entitled when it is incorporated with the University of St. Andrews. And why not? Because, he says, it will share in the endowments granted to the University of St. Andrews. As far as I know that is not so. The University of St. Andrews when it completes the incorporation of this subordinate body will not derive one single farthing of additional public money to sustain its corporate existence. It simply comes to this—that this Act of incorporation between the University College of Dundee and St. Andrews University is to be penalised by the Treasury to the extent of £1,000 a year. In other words, that which has been felt by all the local educational authorities in the country to be a most desirable grant is to be abolished to the extent of the withdrawal of this annual grant of £1,000. I cannot see any reason to justify that contention. There is to be no change in the position of St. Andrews University. On the contrary, it is very probable that it will incur additional expenses on account of incorporation, and there is no change in the position of the University College of Dundee. The intention of the incorporation is merely to facilitate the working of both institutions, and because of this the money allocated to the College of Dundee is to be withdrawn. I say that is a principle which requires reconsideration, and I hope that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman is not to be taken as the last word of the Treasury upon this subject. I do hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accord a full and fair hearing to the official representatives of the University College of Dundee. I will venture to repeat the appeal which my hon. friend has made, and I ask the Secretary to the Treasury to give us some assurance that before the preparation of next year's estimate and before he decides to withdraw this annual grant he will at least do us the favour of allowing us to be heard in support of the maintenance of this grant, and give us an opportunity of placing before him arguments upon that question.

MR. STUART: I think the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury might give us satisfaction by answering the appeal I made to him, and which has also been alluded to by the hon. Member who has just spoken. As I brought the matter forward in reference to the continuance of this £1,000 a year which is granted to the University College of Dundee, and as the uncertainty in which we have been left is a very serious matter, I really think that it is a little hard for the right hon. Gentleman to assume that he answers my position by saying that this college shares in the endowments granted to St. Andrews University. I think that is drawing the line a little too far. I also want to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the very solid fact which I think ought to affect the right hon. Gentleman in reconsidering the attitude he has taken up. He has spoken about the incorporation of St. Andrews University and the University College of Dundee as being a reason for withdrawing this £1,000 grant, because the Dundee College is to get the benefit of certain grants which will be made to St. Andrews University. But as I pointed out in bringing this matter before the Committee, that is exactly the position at the present time of a large college in Newcastle, which profits very largely by the grants made to the ancient University of Durham. That is not looked upon as any reason why a sum of money should not be granted to this college at Newcastle-on-Tyne. I have received but cold comfort from the right hon. Gentleman upon this question. His reply is cold comfort to every educationalist in Scotland who is desirous of seeing harmonious working between the ancient University College of St. Andrews and the new University College of Dundee. This has been indicated as desirable by Parliament, and yet it is held over our heads that as soon as that is brought about the joint concern is to be deprived of £1,000 a year. I do not think there is any reasonableness in that proposal at all. I do not desire to do more than point out my dissatisfaction with the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, and to express the hope that the authorities and the representatives of the University of St. Andrews and the University College of Dundee, whose interests are affected in this matter, will be afforded an opportunity of being heard, and that full consideration will be given to the arguments which have been laid before the Committee on this subject.

MR. CALDWELL: It now appears that as soon as the college at Dundee becomes part of a national university of Scotland it will then cease to have any claim on this fund. The total sum borne on this estimate for England, putting aside what is given to national universities, is £63,500, and the Scotch proportion of that amount, on the basis of eleven-eightieths, would be £8,730 for similar purposes, but only £1,000 is actually given to Scotland, and that is given to Dundee. You now propose to take that sum away from Dundee, but that will only make stronger the claim of the Glasgow College of Science for support from this fund. All we ask is that if you are going to give grants to colleges of science apart from national universities, give Scotland her equivalent share, which is £8,730. We have always complained that under this Vote Scotland gets practically nothing, and we have been told that Scotland gets money for her national universities; but that is an entirely different matter, as the Secretary to the Treasury has now been compelled to admit. As far as the Glasgow College of Science is concerned it is one of the best schools in the United Kingdom, and it is subsidised out of the Glasgow rates to the extent of £6,000 a year; and if English colleges of science get grants from this fund, why not the Glasgow College of Science also; not necessarily to cover all its expenses, but to assist the local subsidy, and to render its work, which is now much impaired for want of money, more efficient. I call the attention of the Scotch Office to the matter, and I ask the Lord Advocate to note that Scotland only gets £1,000 out of this fund, and that even that is to be taken away.

*MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): As the right hon. Gentleman is being laid under pressure, it is necessary to mention other deserving cases lest they be forgotten. A hardship has arisen in the case of the University College at Sheffield, owing to the fact that the departmental committee examined into the case of that college at a time which happened to operate unfairly against it. The scheme of the departmental committee was that the grant in each case should be proportioned to the amount locally contributed. In the case of Sheffield the inquiry was held just before a very exceptional local effort had been made in connection with the Diamond Jubilee. If the inquiry had been held after that effort, the claim of the Sheffield College would have been in a very different position. I think the Secretary to the Treasury foreshadowed that there is going to be a reconsideration of the allocation of these grants, and I venture to express the hope that that reconsideration will not be put off on account of the disputes connected with the Scotch colleges, as to which I wish to say nothing.

Vote agreed to.

8. £5, to complete the sum for London University.

CLASS V.

9. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £255,384, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad, and of the Consular Establishments Abroad and other Expenditure chargeable on the Consular Vote."

EARL PERCY (Kensington, S.): I have put down a motion for the reduction of this Vote, not so much with a view to pressing it to a division as in the hope of being able to elicit some assurance from Her Majesty's Government with reference to a subject which I confess I view with great anxiety—namely, the reduction of our Consular establishments in the internal provinces of Asiatic Turkey. On the 22nd March last I put a question to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs with regard to the Vice-Consulate at Bitlis, and the reply I received was this—

"The British Vice-Consulate at Bitlis has not been abolished. The post is at present vacant, but is visited as occasion arises by Her Majesty's Consul at Van, and, if events should occur in Armenia rendering an appointment desirable, Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople has authority to take the necessary steps."*

* See The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxxi, page 42.

Mr. Stuart Wortley.

That reply only served to increase my anxiety, because it seems to show that Her Majesty's Government have in contemplation the reduction of the number of our Consulates in the interior of Asiatic Turkey. I do not ask for any declaration from Her Majesty's Government as to their general policy with regard to Turkey; but I think when we are asked to vote this large sum of money for consular and diplomatic services we have a right to ask for some explanation of what appears to be a grave departure in policy, involving, as I think, consequences of a serious and even disastrous character. Before I proceed to details I should like to place the general facts before the Committee. I think it is hardly realised that at the present moment we have no British consular representatives permanently residing in any one of the internal provinces of Turkey between Konia, Sivas, and Aleppo on the west and Van on the Persian frontier. That is to say, except in Trebizond and Erzerum on the north, we have absolutely no means of acquiring first hand information as to what is going on in any one of the great towns which were the principal scenes of the serious disturbances five years ago. That is not a situation which we can regard with equanimity. I do not want to revive unpleasant memories. Whatever view we may hold as to the culpability of Turkey for past events, I am quite certain that the Turkish Government is sincerely anxious to prevent similar occurrences in the future, and that so far as its power extends in the interior it will take steps to do so. But that does not justify us in withdrawing any guarantee we now possess. We have undertaken a very serious responsibility under the Berlin Treaty to help Turkey to render easier the conditions of life of the subject population of Asia Minor. The least we can do in fulfilment of such a responsibility is not to grudge the expenditure of a few hundreds of pounds in maintaining our representatives in the country, who can do much to avert breaches of law and order. I feel that we are bound not to withdraw any safeguards which we at present possess to help the Turkish Government to render happier and more tolerable the lives of the subject population in Asiatic Turkey. I think, therefore, we should do nothing to lessen the number of those Consuls through whom we can at present bring influence to bear. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman may say that these Consuls in the interior have very little power indeed, and that their whole time is generally occupied in tendering advice to the provincial governments which is never taken, and in writing reports which are pigeon-holed in the Embassy at Constantinople. That is not the view entertained by anyone who knows the country. I believe from my own experience that there have been instances in which the mere presence of these men has prevented acts of tyranny and injustice by individual governors and acts of folly by revolutionaries and others which might lead to fresh outbreaks of popular fanaticism and another series of disastrous consequences. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not use the argument that the presence of these Consuls is not justified by the amount of British trade in these provinces. The amount of British trade in the interior has never been very great, and it is perfectly notorious that, but for political reasons, we would not have placed any Consuls there at all. I said that we have no consular representatives in any of the central provinces of Asiatic Turkey. It is true that we have an arrangement at the present moment by which the British representative at Diarbekr spends six months of the year in that town, and the other six in Kharput. I do not wish for a moment to throw any doubt on the capacity and ability of those who have undertaken the dual duty, but I am quite sure it is practically impossible for anyone to keep himself in touch with what is going on in the combined provinces of Mamoureted, Aziz and Diarbekr. This argument applies with tenfold force to the case of Bitlis. The right hon. Gentleman, in his reply to me, stated that the British Consul at Van had instructions to go over to Bitlis whenever circumstances arose which made his presence desirable. I should have thought that a mere glance at the map would have shown the inadequacy of that arrangement. The Consul at Van not only has an enormous amount of work to do in the town itself, but he has to make extended tours in the mountains of the Nestorian district south of Van, and also on the Persian frontier, where inroads by Armenian revolutionists and Kurdish raids are a perpetual menace to the peace of the vilayet. Even if he does go across once or twice a year to Bitlis he is only on the fringe of the vilayet which extends to the borders of Kharput, and includes the most poverty-stricken district of Mush. These are the points to which I wish to direct the attention of Her Majesty's Government. The assertion that we can always intervene if occasion arises seems to me to be perfectly useless. Past history shows that intervention after the occasion is generally nugatory, and that in 1894-5 almost every case in which disturbance arose and where the population got out of hand, was in towns where we had no British representative on the spot. I think one of the greatest blunders, to call it by its mildest term, ever made by a Government was made by the Government in 1882 when they withdrew our Consuls. Surely Her Majesty's Government having that warning before them will not commit a similar blunder. There are a great many circumstances in the Near East which give rise to considerable anxiety. We have been told that Russia has obtained from Turkey the power to veto the construction of all railways in the northern provinces, and to prevent Turkey—because Turkey cannot build railways herself—from using the only possible means of developing the country and increasing the happiness of the population. I confess I cannot understand how any Government which has undertaken in diplomatic phraseology to superintend the introduction of reforms which I suppose are not limited to reforms of the constitutional machinery of Government, but which extend also to the material improvement of the country, can acquiesce in that claim of Russia. However, that is a question of high policy which I will not enter into now. We have taken it upon ourselves to help these people, not merely Armenians or Christians, but the whole of the poor population of the interior, and I do think that the very least we can ask for is that we shall not deprive ourselves of one of the means ready to our hand, by which we can make our influence felt, particularly as there are a good many circumstances which are giving rise to a considerable amount of anxiety.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I should like to support the remarks of my noble friend. It does seem to me an enormous mistake to withdraw from the whole of Asia Minor the sources of information which Her Majesty's Government have. It cannot be forgotten that England is under special responsibility with regard to Asia Minor. We have undertaken to defend Asia Minor against Russian attack in case any further attempt were made on it. That is a very serious responsibility, and in order to keep ourselves in a position to fulfil that responsibility, it does seem to me essential that we should retain the Consuls we have there. These Consuls have been regarded as the local advisers of the governors of these provinces, who go to them for advice and assistance, and what we see now is the wholesale withdrawal of those sources of information. Undoubtedly this withdrawal is very much more serious when we consider the circumstances to which the noble Lord has alluded, and which are a matter of notoriety, and the events which have quite recently occurred. It is hardly too much to say that the whole of Asia Minor is now divided between Germany and Russia into two spheres of influence, Germany claiming the whole of the south, and Russia the whole of the north. That is a very serious matter. We know how these spheres of influence begin, and we have sometimes seen how they end. First of all, a sphere of influence is supposed to be nothing more than the exclusive right to construct railways, and then the people who come to look after the railways sometimes take the form of troops. Are the Government prepared to tear up the treaty we made with Turkey, under which we have assumed responsibility for the safety of Asia Minor? I do not know, but there are people who think we have a very serious future before us. I believe there are persons in high authority who believe that we may be at war with Russia, and not only with Russia alone, but perhaps with Russia and Germany combined. What is quite certain is that we cannot make an effective war against Russia unless we have access to the Black Sea, and if we are to give over Asia Minor to Germany and Russia we may find ourselves in such a position that even the Sultan himself cannot give permission to our fleet to pass through the Dardanelles. If there is one place in the whole world where we have undoubtedly done good—and considerable good—to the people and the governors of the country, that place is Asia Minor. I therefore, with my noble friend, very much regret the continuance of the policy of withdrawing these Consuls. I would especially direct the attention of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs to the very threatening aspect of affairs which seems to be developing in Asia Minor, which is being divided as it were between Russia and Germany. I hope my right hon. friend will be able to tell us that the statements in the press are either exaggerated or altogether unfounded. I hope, also, he will tell us that the Government do not intend to go on with this policy of withdrawing British Consuls from Asia Minor.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I assume the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs does not wish to reply before we pass to other matters connected with this Vote. With regard to Item M, the question of the arrangement made with Abyssinia is one with reference to which I think we have been left very much in the dark. We are aware from other sources of the general nature of the arrangement come to a long time ago between the Government and Abyssinia. I cannot help thinking that the time has come when the publication of the arrangement which has been come to as to the boundary between Abyssinia and the Soudan would be wise. The reduction of which notice has been given by myself and others concerns a point we have discussed before, but which we are obliged to go on discussing, because the Government will not clear their own minds on the subject. I refer to the question of slavery in Zanzibar, and I propose to move a reduction of the salary of Sir Arthur Hardinge in respect to the position in Zanzibar. I wish to move this reduction without making any sort of personal attack on Sir Arthur Hardinge. I have, in common with all members of the Committee who have watched his public services, the highest respect and regard for Sir Arthur Hardinge, who is one of the best men in our service. But we think him out of place in this one particular station, not because of any defect or inability, but because of the particular and very special views which he holds—views different from the views of the vast majority of hon. Members—on the question of slavery. I do not think that that will be denied by anyone who has had the advantage of studying this question, and especially Sir Arthur Hardinge's replies to the Government. It cannot be denied that Sir Arthur Hardinge does hold these peculiar views. Indeed, on the two occasions in which he came into conflict with the Foreign Office and Lord Salisbury he maintained them with great ability. It is said that a promise as to slavery was given at the time we took over the administration of Zanzibar. Lord Kimberley was responsible for the conditions on which the administration was taken over, and he has altogether rejected the view that any such promise was given as the present Government think was given as regards slavery. Sir Arthur Hardinge's was the official speech, and there was not a word in it of which anyone could complain. The so-called promise under which we were supposed to be more tender towards slavery in Zanzibar than elsewhere was contained in a speech not of Sir Arthur Hardinge, but of Sir Lloyd Matthews, in command of the forces of Zanzibar. He is a man who is deeply imbued with the Zanzibar feeling, but I cannot help remembering that even in that speech of Sir Lloyd Matthews the word "slavery" was not used. The phrase relied upon was that in which he alluded to the intention of the British Government that the faith of Islam and all the ancient customs of the country would be maintained there. Now, Lord Kimberley, who gave the instructions on which that speech was made, denied that there was any right to commit this country to upholding slavery, and for a long time this so-called promise was not alleged as a defence of the recognition of slavery. Other reasons were given for not acting; by Sir Arthur Hardinge we were told that the country was disturbed. The First Lord of the Treasury had made a promise to this House that as soon as practicable the same steps would be taken in regard to the abolition of slavery in East Africa as had been taken in other parts of the British dominions. These promises to maintain old customs have often been made in regard to India, but they have never been held to mean that the laws of England with regard to slavery would not apply. There have been cases where direct promises have been made in regard to slavery. In Canada we promised the French that the institution of slavery would be maintained; but, of course, that promise was not acted upon. The case of the Soudan is very closely analogous to that of British India. In a series of speeches by Lord Kitchener he used language very similar to that, in regard to ancient laws and customs, employed by Sir Lloyd Matthews and Sir Arthur Hardinge. But slavery has been abolished in the Soudan, and what we want is that similar action should be taken in East Africa in regard to slavery as has been taken in the Soudan. I can say for those who are interested in this question that if the British Government would at once do in British East Africa what was done in India in 1843 we should, for the time, be satisfied. The abolition of the legal recognition of slavery which took place in India in 1843 is in advance of anything which the Government have been able to do up to the present time in East Africa. I repeat we do Sir Arthur Hardinge no injustice when we maintain that the arguments he has carried on with the Foreign Office point to a gradual alteration of slavery into a system of apprenticeship, which is, however, only slavery in another form. One of the greatest dangers we have to encounter is the keeping on in our protectorates of apprenticeship. Sir Arthur Hardinge has attacked particular missionaries in East Africa, and picked out one for special praise, because he held views differing from every other, and "at variance with popular prejudice," and particularly with the views of Bishop Tucker. I believe the views of Bishop Tucker are far more consonant with the views held in this House than are those of Sir Arthur Hardinge. Then there is Colonel Lugard, whose views are emphatic, and who believes that British East Africa has been prepared for the abolition of the legal status of slavery, and that it should be abolished. Very largely in consequence of what was stated in this House, and the debates and promises made in this House, we admit that some progress has been made in that direction in East Africa, although we think that progress has been slow. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £100.

*MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): In seconding the motion of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, I desire to endorse all the words which have fallen from his lips in paying a tribute of admiration to the ability of Sir A. Hardinge; but I also entirely endorse what he said in regard to the pro-slavery policy which has been pursued under Sir Arthur Hardinge and this Government throughout the area over which he has very large powers. I know that Her Majesty's Government feels somewhat inclined to resent these constant debates in reference to slavery, but I would point out that we have, as a result of these debates, on more than one occasion, got some steps in advance. The pressure we have been able to bring in this House has produced a better state of things in Zanzibar and the islands which otherwise would never have been obtained. One good that has been effected is that those who have charge of the slaves now know that they must treat them in a very different way from what they did a few years ago, and therefore our debates have done something for the cause of humanity. But it seems to me there has been something lacking in the policy pursued by the Government in the desire to see the immediate emancipation of the slaves. Two years ago Sir Lloyd Matthews in a despatch alluded to the "hasty and ill-timed interference of friends at home." These words are somewhat remarkable when we remember that Sir John Kirk sixteen years ago, in 1884, said that "the time was ripe for the entire emancipation of the population of the Zanzibar Protectorate." Sir Arthur Hardinge two years ago said, "It is idle to treat the African negro as if he were a full-grown free man." I am not one of those who think that the raw Kaffir or negro should be given the same amount of freedom as a white man. Naturally, they should be put under some kind of restriction, but they ought to have freedom as free men, and ought not to be considered the goods and chattels of another human being. As an illustration of the character of the spirit displayed from time to time by our officials in Zanzibar, I might allude to a case in which their policy of endeavouring to conciliate the Arab owners of slaves was shown. Soon after the present Government came into power an Arab was found guilty of most inhuman conduct towards a particular slave. In the Zanzibar Gazette it is recorded that this man, Abdulla Bin Ali, punished his slave by welding the irons on his flesh, and feeding him with one cocoanut morning and evening. Well, I am very glad that the Government prosecuted that individual, that he was found guilty, and sentenced by Judge Cracknall to seven years imprisonment. But the moment that Judge Cracknall's back was turned that cruel brute was released and practically whetted by the Government. I do not think that the policy pursued by Sir Arthur Hardinge and his subordinates is to be surprised at when we find Her Majesty's Government acquiescing in all these sort of acts in regard to slavery. For instance, the Sultan, who was put on the throne by the British Government, and who was not the natural successor of the previous Sultan, was allowed to inherit 30,000 slaves, and the excuse put forward was that the decree which prevented the inheriting of all slaves except by the sons of previous owners did not affect the Sultan himself. The pledges given by Her Majesty's Government have been very specific. On coming into power they said that slavery would be removed at the earliest possible moment, and as the right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean had quoted, the Government pledged themselves to extend to the mainland the process already carried out in the islands. Sir Rennel Rodd stated that it was impossible to administer the mainland differently from the islands. Lord Curzon, when Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs two years ago, as an excuse for delay, said that "the conditions were not favourable on the mainland to carry out the pledge of the abolition of slavery. We must wait for the result of the experiment in the islands."

Now, from recent despatches we find that the result of the experiment has been successful in the islands, and to a large extent satisfactory. Let me read one paragraph from a despatch by Sir Arthur Hardinge dated 6th January this year—

"The progress of the emancipation decree is at once gradual and steady, and is now attended with comparatively little trouble to the owners of plantations, who, with few exceptions, are adapting themselves to the new system, and paying their workmen, whether free men or nominal slaves, in pice."

I call upon the Government to carry out the pledge which Lord Curzon in this House, when Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, gave in the name of the Government two years ago. The present Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs at the commencement of last session said that the

"strip of the mainland was only taken over in 1895, and since then there had been a rebellion and a mutiny to deal with."

Three events had been reported: first, a mutiny of black troops; second, an attack on the Indian contingent; third, the slaughter by a tribe of a British officer and nine men, and he gave these as an excuse for not carrying out their pledges. But he added that "the Government did not depart from Mr. Balfour's pledge that at the earliest opportunity they hoped to extend to the mainland the process already carried out in the islands. It was Lord Salisbury's opinion that until the Government became more settled on the mainland it was impossible to take further steps."

The Government finds an excuse for its inaction in the dispatch of Lord Kimberley, and as has been explained by the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean, it has only occurred to them as a suitable afterthought for throwing over the pledges of the First Lord of the Treasury and of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs as to the abolition of slavery on the mainland. When we analyse it what does that excuse amount to? We find that Lord Kimberley did not allude to anything except law and religion. Now, the Mohammedan law does not give any approval to slavery. It is well known that if an individual who belongs to the Mohammedan faith frees his slaves he will, according to the Koran, have a better time of it in a future life. Slavery is now permitted because it is said to be in accordance with ancient customs. Instead of correcting Sir Lloyd Matthews and the impression he may have left on the minds of a few Arabs, the Government are riding off on an excuse to prevent them carrying out their pledges. It seems to me that the Government have had many opportunities of carrying out their pledges, and if they had desired to do so they could have abolished slavery throughout the whole of the Sultan of Zanzibar's dominions. When the Sultan was appointed, and the mainland was quiet, they might have adopted some measure to release the 200,000 slaves in the mainland strip of the Sultan's dominions. That area is under the direct control of the Foreign Office, and they can do whatever they like on it. This strong Government seems to me to ride off on an excuse instead of giving instructions that any wrong impressions in regard to law and custom should be removed; and they keep to views which are contrary to the opinions of all Englishmen. I appeal to the House to support the resolution, not that we really want to reduce Sir Arthur Hardinge's salary, but because we want to abolish slavery in the protectorates, and as a protest that the Government in not carrying out the pledges they have given have committed what is little short of a breach of faith.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item P (Salaries of the General Consular Service) be reduced by £100, in respect of the salary of the Agent and Consul General at Zanzibar."—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

MR. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): Whilst we get any number of expressions of sympathy from gentlemen representing the Foreign Office with the views we have expressed on this side, we never get any further on the real question of giving freedom to the slaves under our own protection in the islands of Pemba and Zanzibar, and it is not far to look why we do not get any forwarder on this question. You have a gentleman connected with the island of Pemba as a public servant who is not in sympathy or harmony with the views the Government has expressed repeatedly in this House. That gentleman in the despatches we all read carefully has done this repeatedly. He has argued in those despatches time after time to allow a legal status to slavery in the island, to allow that to remain as it was before we established a British Protectorate. The Government in their despatches have given Sir Arthur Hardinge distinct and clear orders what to do, and in reply to these orders anybody who reads the Blue-books can see that he does not say he will carry out these orders, but that he argues against them. No public company, and no master with a servant would argue with him after a certain time. After giving him absolute and clear orders the time for argument is gone. If a public or private servant, after you have given perfectly clear and distinct orders, does not obey, all I can say is that I should join issue with that servant and say, "You must carry out my orders and policy or go your own way and make room for somebody who will." What I wish to ask is what is the policy of the Government? Is it Sir Arthur Hardinge's or is it not? If it is not the policy of Sir Arthur Hardinge, will they tell us what their policy is, and whether they will put servants in who will carry out their policy? We want action, and I think the country will call upon the Government to carry out their policy. We are the only European Government in Africa whose servants have acknowledged the legal position of slavery. A nice position for us to occupy at the end of the nineteenth century. We were the leaders of the great anti-slavery movement at the beginning of the century, and we are the last European power in Africa to-day paying, by a Vote of this House, a servant who acknowledges the legal status of slavery. That is a strong statement to make. Let us see whether it is correct or not. It is well to bear in mind what the facts are. In Mr. Lloyd's court near Mombasa there is a British judge paid for by a Vote of this House under the Consul General whose salary we are discussing at the present moment. On the court house the British flag flies, and the whole process is carried on in the name of Her Majesty. A slave owner appears before him and declares that a certain woman is his property. She repudiates the claim and asks for freedom, but does not get it. Mr. Lloyd in a British court hands her back to her master. We want to know what the Government are going to do. Is Mr. Lloyd to go on handing back slaves from the mission stations to their masters who claim them? If the Government say they propose to make no change, all I can say is that if they will stick to that then they are in absolute harmony with Sir Arthur Hardinge, and not in harmony with what they stated here last year. Are they or are they not going to carry out the able policy of Sir John Kirk and Sir Harry Johnstone? If either of these men was Consul General at the islands of Pemba and Zanzibar, the country would have unlimited confidence in him doing the best he could. If we had men there like Lord Cromer or Captain Murdo, who has charge of the Egyptian slave department, the country would have unlimited confidence, but anybody who reads the despatches of Sir Arthur Hardinge knows that his opinions are diametrically opposed to the opinions which the Government have expressed. Are we going to give up the fight with Sir Arthur Hardinge, or are we going to acknowledge that the civil servants in Africa are as lawless as some of the church clergymen who are civil servants in this country? It is a very serious position for the Government to take up. When they make statements from that bench on this question they have a right to be true and loyal to the House of Commons. They should see that their servants in Africa, whoever they are and whatever they are doing, carry out the policy which they lay down and which this House lays down as the proper and correct policy. Clearly the policy of Sir Arthur Hardinge is not the policy which has been laid down, and it is quite time that the Government said which of these two policies is going to be the policy of the future. There are some very ugly rumours in these two islands which I think require investigation—rumours that British subjects, in a way which we all know is absolutely illegal, are themselves interested directly or indirectly in this slave traffic, and that that is one of the reasons that Sir Arthur Hardinge does not carry out the instructions of the Government. I do not know whether it is true or not. It has been told me often enough that that is one of the reasons. If it is so, the Government should not protect any British subject who has got any remuneration or advantage from the slave trade. The law is perfectly clear that it is a criminal offence for any of Her Majesty's subjects to hold slaves, or take any profit or get any advantage from slavery. If there is not some truth in these ugly rumours, why does not Sir Arthur Hardinge carry out the policy so often expressed by Her Majesty's Government? These magistrates are acknowledging the legal status of slavery. What is their position if they come to England and you had one of these decisions to cite against them? Their position is that they have committed a criminal offence, and you would have the Attorney General defending these men in a criminal charge. We, as a great nation whose traditions have been on this question honourable and true, have taken the islands of Pemba and Zanzibar, and an immense territory in Africa, with the responsibility of tens of millions of natives—we have taken these in the face of Europe to do what? To stop the slave trade, and we have not up to the present time done anything at all to make things better. Before we took over these islands, we had a certain number of men-of-war protecting the seas from the slave trade. Have we the same number of men-of-war there now, and are we spending the same amount of money? Why, only the other day a ship was going from our own territory with a lot of slaves on board. It is an impossibility in these two countries to run free labour and slave labour side by side. You must make up your mind which it is going to be. Sir John Kirk told you in 1884 that one thing was certain—that until slavery is dealt with we shall never get free labour, that the present system is certain ruin, that it is neither free labour nor slavery. If you have slave labour, what is the position of free labour? You have got to wipe your hands of the whole thing, or let the people go on with their slavery. Sir John Philip knew the country, and fought for the principle of freedom which the present representative of Her Majesty is not fighting for. Sir Arthur Hardinge is fighting to the best of his ability for vested interest, and the party of slavery. He said on 13th March, 1884, that he believed the non-recognition of slavery by the law was essential to prosperity. Is the Government of that opinion? If the Government is of that opinion, why don't they carry it out and take away the men who are not carrying out their instructions? There is no greater authority than Sir John Kirk, and so far as you have gone in Pemba in the direction of giving freedom, which is very little, and even Sir Arthur Hardinge in his last report admits it—so far as you have gone you have only touched the fringe of it. There is an amount of prosperity going on now which Pemba never knew before. You should be strongly determined to carry out the policy which has been so often stated on that bench without any waverings or argument with your servant. It is past the time for arguing between master and man, and if you take the strong position the country expect, and which you promised to take, you need not fear anybody, but you may rest assured that when you do something to elevate these two islands, and to bring prosperity to them, you will leave at any rate a record that at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century you have done something for the freedom and betterment of humanity.

*MR. DUCKWORTH (Lancashire, Middleton): I wish to say how greatly

disappointing our attitude to-night is on this subject, which has been brought so repeatedly before the House. The progress of emancipating the slaves in East Africa is very slow, and I am sure it must be to the right hon. Gentleman himself very unsatisfactory. The decree abolishing the legal status of slavery in the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba was passed in Parliament in April, 1897; that is three years ago. What I want to emphasise is that, not only has there been no progress, or very little progress, in these islands, but what to my mind is more serious and important still, that nothing has been done on the strip of mainland which is administered from the Foreign Office, and where we are told there are some 200,000 slaves. I put a question to the right hon. Gentleman asking if anything had been done on this strip of mainland, and he had to reply in the negative. I had been informed during the recess that something had been done, and I sent a letter to the right hon. Gentleman, which he never answered. Hence my question to-day. In August, 1897, the First Lord of the Treasury promised in this House that the same conditions should be brought about on the mainland that obtained in the islands. In February last year the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs said to a deputation that waited upon him that the Government had not departed from Mr. Balfour's pledge, and at the earliest opportunity they hoped to carry out the same measures on the mainland as were already in existence in the islands, and yet he has to come before us to-night and admit that nothing whatever has been done in reference to the freeing of the slaves on the mainland. It must be very disagreeable to the right hon. Gentleman himself to have to stand before this House so repeatedly with excuses. Just look at these excuses brought before us in answer to our questions and arguments from time to time. At one time they say they are watching the experiment in the islands before they do anything on the mainland. Surely the time for experiment is long ago past. Then they go on to say that they are afraid there may be outbursts and disturbances on the mainland if they begin to unsettle affairs. Then the troubles in Uganda are pleaded as an excuse why nothing is done. Then the difficulty, forsooth, of obtaining free labour has been pleaded as an excuse.

But the last excuse is, I think, the emptiest and most unreasonable of all. The right hon. Gentleman has said again and again as an excuse why nothing has been done, "We cannot break our pledge to the Sultan." I wish the Government were as strong in keeping their pledges when human beings are before them or interested in what they are doing, as they are when it is a matter of bonds and gold which are at stake. We gave pledges to protect the Armenians, but allowed 100,000 of them to be butchered. Now when about 200,000 slaves are in existence on this strip of mainland, we are year by year met with this excuse that nothing is done on their behalf, and the right hon. Gentleman is compelled, I am sure much against his own nature, disposition and feeling, to stand in his place and simply make excuses to the House. What is there in this last excuse, so often used, and which very likely will be used again by the right hon. Gentleman to-night? It is said that Lord Kimberley before he left office in 1895 gave some pledge or understanding which is binding on the present Government. What is this pledge or understanding?

"On the 1st July, 1895, Sir Arthur Hardinge, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, took over at Mombasa the administration of the mainland territories of the Sultan of Zanzibar, previously carried on by the Imperial British East Africa Company. Previous to doing so he had inquired of Her Majesty's Government whether, on assuming the administration, he might assure the Arabs that the Mohammedan law and religion would be maintained. The Earl of Kimberley, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, replied that he might make it clear that as regards religion and law and the Sultan's sovereignty, no difference was made by the change."

How was this interpreted to the Arabs and the slave dealers on the mainland and in the islands of Pemba and Zanzibar? This is an extract given from the despatch written by Sir Arthur Hardinge, in July, 1895, describing a public meeting which had been held in Mombasa, and attended by the Wali and the leading Arabs, when Sir Lloyd Matthews is stated to have made a speech in Swahili, of which the following is a translation—

"I have come here to-day by order of our Lord, Seyyid Hamed-bin-Thwain, to inform you all that the company have retired from the administration of his territory, and that the great English Government will succeed it, and Mr. Hardinge, the consul-general at Zanzibar, will be the head of the new administration, and will issue all orders in the territory under the sovereignty of His Highness. And all affairs connected with the faith of Islam will be conducted to the honour and benefit of religion, and all ancient customs will be allowed to continue, and his wish is that everything should be done in accordance with justice and law."

That is now interpreted as something intended to cover slavery. Since then we have had Lord Kimberley's emphatic denial that any pledge with regard to slavery was given at all. I shall not repeat it. It has been brought before the House, and it has been in the public press. I have emphasised the words that "all ancient customs will be allowed to continue." It was never intended that these words should be put there, but they have been read into it purposely, I am afraid, to include the continuation of slavery on the mainland. Why have not the Government pointed this out to their officials? Why have they allowed five years to go on without pointing out that they made a great mistake? They have done that to their credit in another instance to which I will now refer. In April there issued from the Foreign Office a remarkable paper. I suppose it has been sent to all Members of Parliament as it has been sent to me, but perhaps many may not have gone through it carefully. It is worthy of careful perusal, for it is a most remarkable document. It refers to correspondence respecting slavery and the slave trade in East Africa and the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba. This correspondence referred to the capture of slave dhows in Zanzibar Harbour, and also to an inquiry as to certain kidnapping of people by Arabs, who watched their opportunity, ran on to the mainland, set the villages on fire, and while the people were running half mad with fear they kidnapped them, put them into these dhows, packed like herrings, and sailed away in order to sell them as slaves in Arabia. This shows that there is still need for great vigilance on the part of those who are sent to coast about in these waters, and it is very interesting to find that our "handy men" can not only fight in South Africa, but can also look after their duty on these coasts, and endeavour to prevent this kidnapping of people and the selling of human beings into slavery. Wherever they can they pounce on these inhuman fiends and bring them, as they deserve to be brought, to justice. These papers reveal another striking instance, showing the bias of our officials in favour of the Arabs and against the freedom of these people according to law. I will not trouble the Committee, as I might, by reading the correspondence in this paper; Members can read it for themselves. I will merely summarise a few of the things so as to give a clear idea of the facts of the case. It appears that a circuit court, at which a British official presides, was instituted for the purpose of carrying out the Sultan's decree, and slaves who claimed their freedom under that decree, and gave their names and the names of their masters and satisfactory proof of their identity, were liberated in great numbers. That this was satisfactory to the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor in office is shown clearly enough. Mr. Curzon said on the 10th February, 1898—

"that the case of any slave thus applying for his freedom must be settled at once."

This was evidently too wide a door and too easy a way for these officials on the mainland. They complained that many of these freed slaves became vagrants, and so, forsooth, to prevent men becoming vagrants they must be deprived of their liberty and kept in slavery. These officials put into force a supplementary article of the decree, which said—

"that any person whose right of freedom shall have been formerly recognised shall be bound on pain of being declared a vagrant to show that he possesses a regular domicile and means of subsistence."

I take it that there are a great number of men in this country who would have a difficulty in doing that, but we do not put them into slavery or even into prison because of their inability to do so. But that is not the worst. These freedom-loving representatives of ours interpreted this article in their own way. They said that it referred to the condition of a slave before, and not after, he secured his liberty, and so they sent out notices that before they were freed the slaves must agree with someone to give them a home and land to cultivate, and secondly—

"When they have found a place to live in they must bring with them the owner or some responsible person or a letter to state that they (the proposed employers) will be responsible for the future of the freed slave settling on their land and will give them land to cultivate."

This is part of a letter, and if I could give the Committee the whole of it they would find that the writer, Mr. Armitage, one of the agents of the Friends' Industrial Mission, goes on to say that many cases of hardship occur through obstacles being placed in the way of slaves obtaining their freedom. Many had to walk long distances; they waited about the Court for several days and then returned very much disheartened because they had not secured their liberty. And no wonder! He then goes on to say—

"A slave now to obtain his freedom must leave his master's shamba and run the risk—no light one—of being arrested as a vagrant while he is endeavouring to find an employer, and when he has found such a man the question asked will be, 'Are you free?' and if the reply is 'No,' 'Go and get free first' is certain to follow. The man goes to the court, and, after waiting probably several days before he can even obtain admission there, finds all his trouble in vain, he must tramp back again to his prospective employers, who in all probability will decline to go to the Court or give the man a letter. And who could conscientiously make himself responsible for the future of a free man who could at any time leave the shamba when he chose? How is such a man to live honestly while endeavouring to carry out these orders? Is not this new rule more likely to cause vagrancy than to stop it? If, on the other hand, a man has got his freedom, and can show his medal or his papers (papers are not being given now), and say, 'I am a free man,' he will, without doubt, at once obtain work. Mr. Farler himself supports this view, for you will notice he says in his letter: 'There are hundreds of people ready and glad to make arrangements with freed slaves,' but he does not suggest they would make arrangements with them before they are freed. The sort of people likely to trouble the country as vagrants are not those, in my opinion, who take all the trouble which is involved in attending the Court and obtaining freedom. In nearly all cases it occupies several days, and is tedious and trying in the extreme."

If this is not a way how not to do it, I do not know what is. I could say a great deal more upon this point, but I will not detain the Committee. I am very glad that in this matter the Foreign Secretary, Lord Salisbury, has put an end to this nonsense, and I wish the Government would show the same decision, firmness, and determination all through. What has he done? He has shown very clearly that these officials have put their own interpretation on this matter. Let me read the following—

"The Marquess of Salisbury has had under his consideration your letter of the 23rd ultimo, in which you draw attention to the circumstances in which effect is being given in the Island of Pemba to the decree issued by the Sultan of Zanzibar in April, 1897, abolishing the legal status of slavery."

"The interpretation which Mr. Farler appears to have placed on Article 4 of that decree, and to which you specially allude, is not one which commends itself to Her Majesty's Government."

"In Article 4 the expression, 'Any person whose right to freedom shall have been formally recognised under the second Article, shall be liable to any tax, abatement, corvée, or payment in lieu of corvée, which our Government may at any time hereafter see fit to impose on the general body of its subjects, and shall be bound, on pain of being declared a vagrant, to show that he possesses a regular domicile and means of subsistence,' should not be interpreted as laying any obligation on the slave to find someone to be responsible for his future good behaviour.

"Lord Salisbury has accordingly instructed the Acting British Agent and Consul General at Zanzibar by telegraph in this sense, and has at the same time directed that the cases which had been decided in accordance with the above interpretation of the decree should be reheard without delay."

Would the Committee believe it—the right hon. Gentleman himself who sits opposite signed that telegram, and yet he comes here and stands up in his place and screens these officials. Again and again he has attempted to screen them, to defend them, and to apologise for them. Even the reply sent to this telegram, which will be found in this Paper, shows the spirit of these men and that they ought to be dealt with as we should all deal with them if they were servants of our own. Acting Consul Basil Cave has learned his lesson from Sir Arthur Hardinge, and he shows in his reply to the Foreign Secretary what sort of man he is, clearly indicating that just as a man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still, so he is, in spite of what Lord Salisbury says. He goes on to lecture Lord Salisbury, and to tell him what the consequences will be if such a course is carried out. The Consul General has been on his holidays; he is back again at his duty; but while he was on his holidays he touched at the Cape, and attended a public meeting there, at which he brought up this question of slavery and sneered at the sentimentality of Exeter Hall and about "unctuous rectitude." The fact is, that these officials hob-nob with the Arabs in these quarters, as is quite clear from the letters in the paper to which I have referred. When Sir Arthur Hardinge got back to his duties he went to inspect the different places. Of course, when people know that the "head boss" is coming they prepare for him, and he sees what they want him to see. A man can go to Africa without seeing lions, but if he goes to see lions and looks for them he will find them. And so the head man, the Consul

General, went round to see these places, and he concludes his Report to the Foreign Secretary with these words—

"The Arabs, reassured by the regular payment of compensation, are appreciative of its justice, and, on the whole, are well disposed towards it. They recently showed, indeed, their good feeling by the unprecedented step of decorating the town of Chaki Chaki with flags and bunting last Christmas Day in honour of the chief religious festival of the English officials working in their midst. The impression derived by me from my visit of inspection to Pemba was one of steady progress, reflecting much credit on the Sultan's Government and its officers. The contrast between the state of the island to-day and on the occasion of my first visit to it in the latter part of 1894, before any attempt had been made to introduce European control, is undoubtedly very striking."

What a burlesque! Mohammedans celebrating Christmas with Christians, and both preventing the slaves who have a legal right to their liberty from securing it. This is a serious matter, and I feel sure that Parliament will not much longer allow the right hon. Gentleman to stand up and excuse these officials, who are not carrying out as they ought the law of the country. What is more, I feel sure that the country will not stand it. There is a very strong feeling in the constituencies on this question, and if it were not that so much attention is taken up by the lamentable war in South Africa, we should hear more of this matter than we have heard. England is still the home of the free, and I hope she will continue to be.

"'Tis the land of the free,
So it ever shall be;
Her children no fetters can bind.
Ere Britons are slaves
She shall sink in the waves,
And leave not a vestige behind.
If the African stand
But once on her strand,
That moment his shackles are broke;
A captive no more,
He leaps on her shore,
And shakes from his shoulders the yoke."

But not only have poets sung the praises of the liberty of this Empire, but orators and statesmen have used their burning eloquence on this glorious theme, and in the words of one who was able to speak on this subject with great eloquence, I will close these remarks.

"I speak"—said he—"in the spirit of the British law, which makes liberty commensurate with and inseparable from British soil, which proclaims, even to the stranger and sojourner the moment he sets his foot on British earth, that the ground on which he treads is holy, and consecrated by the genius of universal emancipation. No matter in what language his doom may have been pronounced; no matter what complexion, incompatible with freedom, an Indian or an African sun may have burned upon him; no matter in what disastrous battle his liberty may have been broken down; no matter with what solemnities he may have been devoted upon the altar of slavery—the first moment he touches the sacred soil of Britain the altar and the god sink together in the dust, his soul walks abroad in her own majesty, his body swells beyond the measure of his chains, that burst from around, and he stands redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the irresistible genius of universal emancipation.”

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): By the rules of the House I can only deal with the discussion initiated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean, and the particular motion with which he concluded his speech. But I can say that the remarks made by hon. Members respecting Asiatic Turkey will receive careful attention, and that I do not think there is any indication of a serious change in the policy which the Government have previously carried out. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the question of Abyssinia, and asked the Government to make a statement as to the present position of the frontier negotiations. That is not in our power at the present time to do. The negotiations have been going on for a considerable period, and are being conducted in a wholly amicable fashion with the Emperor Menelik, but they depend almost entirely upon the progress of the survey of territory. That survey has made some progress, but the surveying party have met with very great difficulties, and until that work is accomplished it will be impossible for us to make any statement as to the line of demarcation to be adopted. The right hon. Gentleman very rapidly diverged from that subject to one which has always interested the House very much—namely, the question of slavery, chiefly on the mainland of East Africa. I find some difficulty in answering the criticisms which have been made to-night, not because they contain any fresh matter, but because though I have been Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs for something less than two years; but during that time I have had to trouble the House with no less than six or seven set speeches—made in reply not to fresh orators, but on every occasion to almost identically the same speakers, who have, if I may say so without disrespect, almost always employed identically the same arguments. I do not say they have all diverged into the poetic vein of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. He, at least, has added a fresh lustre of quotation to a well-worn theme, but most of the speeches I confess I know almost by heart, and a great deal better than I know the speeches I have made in reply to them. The point I have to make in the very few remarks I propose to address to the Committee on the subject is that there is no difference of principle between Her Majesty's Government and those who have addressed us with such vigour. The desire for the abolition of slavery is absolutely identical in all quarters of the House. The only question between us is whether in this particular case it is practicable or desirable that the transition from the one state to the other should be abrupt or gradual. Hon. Members who have spoken to-night press for an abrupt transition; the Government think they should content themselves in the case of the mainland strip of about ten miles in breadth, with a gradual transition. I submit that, in view of the decision which has been come to on previous occasions, it lies with those who oppose this policy, which is the policy of the late Government as well as of the present Government, to show that some evils are occurring, that those who have administered the law have been found not to have acted in accordance with the expectations which had been formed. But this evening we have not had one shred or suggestion of evidence that anything has occurred in connection with slavery on the east coast of Africa to justify this House in supposing that the expectations which were held out have not been fulfilled. We have not had one case of cruelty or of complaint brought before us; we have had only one breach of the law, and that was three or four years old, and had already been disposed of.

MR. BAYLEY: Her Majesty's representative at Mombasa is yet acting contrary to the law with regard to slavery there; he is doing so to-night I believe.

*MR. BRODRICK: The hon. Member did not bring before us any specific cases. What the hon. Member did was to content himself with a very general charge against Sir Arthur Hardinge of a most libellous character, and which he did not support by a tittle of argument or evidence. The hon. Member said that Sir Arthur Hardinge acted as he did because some British subjects were interested in the slave traffic.

MR. BAYLEY: Excuse me; I said there were rumours to that effect, but that I did not believe them.

*MR. BRODRICK: Oh, I beg pardon. The hon. Member omitted that important qualification. These are only rumours, and yet the hon. Member says Sir Arthur Hardinge laid himself out to protect the slave trade from a corrupt motive, to assist a certain number of British subjects whom he did not specify.

MR. BAYLEY: I said distinctly that that was a rumour which was pretty generally held.

*MR. BRODRICK: Then I appeal to the House whether it is desirable that hon. Members speaking on mere rumour—which I have never heard before, although I take a good deal of interest in the question—should, without a single fact or quotation or tittle of evidence to support it, get up here and advertise to the four winds of heaven the charge that Sir Arthur Hardinge had from a corrupt motive over and over again—

MR. BAYLEY: I never used the word "corrupt."

*MR. BRODRICK: Over and over again—at least half a dozen times—the hon. Member declared that Sir Arthur Hardinge laid himself out to frustrate the intentions of the Government. Now he says it is a pure rumour that certain British subjects are interested in the slave trade. The whole suggestion is an absolute fabrication, and the currency the hon. Member has given to it appears to me to do very little credit to his position as a Member of the House of Commons. The hon. Member who has just sat down said there had been very little progress in the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba, and that nothing whatever had been done on the mainland. These statements are, if he will permit me to say so, the very reverse of the facts. In the first place, with regard to Zanzibar and Pemba, it is perfectly true, as I have told the Committee on various occasions, that a great many of the slaves will not take advantage of the power of becoming free which has been given them—a power which is perfectly well known to every slave throughout the two islands. Inexplicable as it may seem to us, everybody who has had anything to do with the islands or with the position of slavery in the islands is aware that there is a certain old feudal system between the masters and the slaves, that where the slaves have been well treated, they are not desirous of changing their position. Consequently, the number who have come to the court for emancipation has not been as large as we had originally hoped and supposed it would be. There were, however, nearly 5,000 last year, and a very large number were freed without coming to the court. In the island of Pemba last year there was a very serious outbreak of small-pox, which carried off a large number both of slaves and of free-men, and caused an almost total cessation of appeals to the court. I do not think that anyone, reading the Report laid before the House with regard to the state of slavery in Zanzibar and Pemba, can deny that there is great evidence, not only of complete contentment, but of the fact that the change being carried out in this gradual manner has led to an increase in the prosperity of these two islands. When we come to the mainland strip, it is perfectly true that the full measure of emancipation which has been given in Zanzibar and Pemba, and which my right hon. friend foreshadowed in a speech made four or five years ago in which he said that the same system would be carried out as soon as possible on the mainland, has not yet been given. I have pointed out on previous occasions the difficulties in the way of making a further move in that direction as rapidly on the mainland as has been done on the islands. But there is no question whatever that the situation of the two places is wholly distinct. The power and influence of the Sultan over his subjects in Zanzibar and Pemba has been very considerable, and has gone a long way towards bringing about the present state of things in the islands, but that power is not equal on the mainland. There has, however, been a gradual process of emancipation going on there. In the first place the sale and purchase of slaves is not allowed, and has not been allowed for many years on the mainland strip; then all children born of slave parents since 1890 have been born free; then there are removals from the mainland strip, and the employment given in the interior being considerable, the inducement to remove increases emancipation.

MR. DUCKWORTH: But they go into slavery when they return.

*MR. BRODRICK: No, I think the hon. Member is mistaken.

MR. DUCKWORTH: When they come within the ten miles limit their master can claim them.

*MR. BRODRICK: I have never heard of a case. Then no inheritance can take place in slaves except by direct succession. The slaves of any man who dies without direct or lineal heirs are all freed. The consequence is that progress is gradually being made towards complete emancipation. It is our desire that that process should be accelerated, but in the meantime it must not be supposed for a moment because we have not been able to accept the views of hon. Members opposite that any injustice is going on. Those who are still slaves on the mainland strip are equal to their masters before the law and before the courts. As in India, under the Act which is quoted here as the palladium of the liberty of the slave, every man who has been a slave is not declared by law to be free, but it is declared by law that every man who is a slave is able to come before the law, equally with his master, and as against his master. That is the case on the mainland of East Africa. The consequence is that cruelty, oppression, violence, maltreatment, has been, as far as we can judge, stopped. If it has not been so, we can count on it that the missionary and other bodies would have informed us of cases which required looking into. I said that I would not trouble the House at any great length, because we have on many previous occasions put forward these views, and I can only say that I do not believe Sir Arthur Hardinge deserves the strictures passed upon him. When the time comes to look back upon Sir Arthur Hardinge's administration as a thing of the past it will be remembered that it was under his administration that the whole of Zanzibar and Pemba had become free, that the process of emancipation was carried on at a rapid rate along the East Coast of Africa, and that, while there were frequent debates in this House, not one single case of violence or oppression of slaves by their masters on the mainland could be alleged.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I think the right hon. Gentleman was not well advised when he commented in a somewhat sarcastic way upon the frequent debates on this subject, and on the fact that the same speeches were made on each occasion. What does the right hon. Gentleman expect? This House would not represent the general feeling of the great body of the British public if on every occasion when that Vote came up a discussion was not raised upon this question. It is only a small point, and it is not easy within so limited a compass to use new arguments. The same old arguments are in force now that were in force four or five years ago, and what we complain of is that those arguments have so little effect on the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues, and their representatives in East Africa. The country has had remarkable patience in this matter. I do not know that that patience has always been displayed in the same degree as now, for I remember that under the late Government—when I confess I was not paying very much attention, except in that left-handed sort of way which a man in one Department looks upon the affairs of his colleagues in another Department—a furious onslaught was made on that Government for their negligence and remissness, in not dealing with this matter, in a much more summary and energetic way than has since been shown, by the present Secretary for the Colonies. I think the right hon. Gentleman therefore has no reason to complain of the temperate and quiet way in which my hon. friends have discussed this question to-night or of any renewal of this discussion which may periodically occur. The right hon. Gentleman has said that there could be no abrupt transition, and that the transition must be gradual. Nobody has asked, I understand, for an abrupt transition, but what is meant by a gradual transition? The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the automatic effect on slavery of the fact that all children born of slaves since 1890 were free. They are, of course, increasing, and I suppose there is a certain automatic process in the introduction to the world of children in those regions; at the same time, that is very small comfort to those born before 1890. They remain in the same condition in which they were. It is not necessary to bring forward cases of excessive cruelty; what the British public and British sentiment object to is the thing itself, the status of slavery. What we object to is the existence of men in that condition, whether the slaves are well or ill treated. Undoubtedly many of them are well treated, just as in the Southern States of America there are thousands of slaves who were exceedingly well treated; and they showed no desire in this case to take advantage of the freedom offered. I remember a story told by a traveller who met a wealthy negro found in a state of slavery. The traveller said, "Why don't you, who are so wealthy, purchase your freedom?" The reply was, "No, sir; nigger property is very bad property." He would not invest money in himself. That might be the case in Zanzibar and elsewhere, but it does not touch the fringe of the question. The Government must recognise the strong and hereditary sentiment in this country in favour of the abolition of slavery—the proud idea that wherever the Queen's authority exists there can be no such thing as a man being the chattel of another. The right hon. Gentleman has not shown the Committee that there has been any active effort on the part of the Government to carry the process to the utmost extent in which it could be carried. Everyone knows that Sir A. Hardinge is one of the most efficient servants possessed by the country, and I have not a word to say against him; but everyone in a position such as his is naturally largely influenced by the genius loci; he sees the difficulties, but he is not so alive to the profound sentiment of this country. My hon. friends have brought forward this matter again from the same motives which actuated them before. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Government have every desire to accelerate this process. Let them show some evidence of this desire and some result of it. Let them make it plain to Sir A. Hardinge that the country is really in earnest in this matter, that it is not a mere pious opinion, a mere decayed tradition that there should be no slavery under the Queen, but that it should be put into force, not as the right hon. Gentleman suggested, abruptly, or in spite of all the difficulties that may stand in the way, but, at all events, with the greatest possible speed that is consistent with the engagements and the interests of Her Majesty's Empire in that part of the world.

COMMANDER BETHELL (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): What I think upon this question—and what a great many of those think who speak annually upon it—is that Sir Arthur Hardinge has apparently set himself to put every conceivable difficulty in the way of meeting our views. I will not criticise Sir Arthur Hardinge now, for I daresay he is doing the best that can be done under the circumstances. My right hon. friend has complained that the speeches year after year have been more or less of the same character, but what I want particularly to ask my right hon. friend is that very complicated question which arose two or three years ago. I desire some explanation as to the action of magistrates who are British subjects on the ten-mile strip of the mainland with regard to questions of slavery which are brought before them. The House will remember that two years ago, in a short debate on this subject, the Attorney General then laid down the law with respect to the rights and powers of British subjects in dealing with questions of slavery. We pressed the Attorney General, and my right hon. friend the Leader of the House was good enough to say that he would take care that the opinion of the Attorney General was cabled to the persons concerned; and this was done. We were told that a British subject might not adjudicate upon a person who had escaped from slavery and whose master asked for him back again, but that they might adjudicate upon the question of ownership of slaves. That strikes one as being a very quaint illustration of the sinuosities of the law. It will be interesting to know what the magistrates who are British subjects upon this ten mile strip now do. Do they adjudicate on any questions at all where slaves are concerned? Do they confine themselves only to those cases where the question of ownership is raised as between two persons? That is to say, if one person has a slave and he is claimed by another, I understand from the Attorney General's decision that the British subject, being a magistrate, could adjudicate. Are those the only cases? It does strike me that it would probably be much better if the British subject refrained from adjudicating upon questions of slavery at all, and those questions might be left to the Mohammedan persons who hold a certain amount of judicial authority in that strip of mainland. It strikes one that if a British official is allowed to adjudicate in such a case as I have mentioned it is very likely that he would attempt to adjudicate on questions of returning persons from freedom to slavery. There would be a great danger of that, and the House would be glad if my right hon. friend could assure us on this point, and, if possible, tell us what are the duties, the powers, and the responsibilities of magistrates upon that ten-mile strip who are, at the same time, British subjects. I will not join in the criticism which has been made upon the general question. I think that probably I do not go quite as far as many hon. Gentlemen on the other side upon this subject. I believe there are enormous difficulties connected with the question, but we must recognise that although for something like thirteen or fourteen years we have been pressing this question, it does not seem that very much has been done, or that as much has been done as we are entitled to expect.

*MR. BRODRICK: In reply to my hon. friend I may say that last year, early in March, instructions were issued providing that no British official should in future administer the law in any case involving the sending back of persons into slavery. That rule has been strictly observed. I have not heard of any case coming before one of the Sultan's judges which was governed by the undertaking that the religious law should be observed. It seems to have been entirely forgotten by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition that an undertaking was given by Lord Kimberley that the law should be observed.

COMMANDER BETHELL: But they do adjudicate upon other cases dealing with slavery.

*MR. BRODRICK: Yes, but British officials do not adjudicate in any case which involves the sending of a slave back to a slave-owner.

 Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. ELLIOT (Durham) said he desired to give the right hon. Gentleman who was in charge of the Vote an opportunity of explaining what had taken place with regard to the very important matter which had been brought before the Committee. The noble Lord the Member for Kensington, who spoke with so great experience of the Turkish Empire, had referred to the withdrawal of our Consular officials, and particularly to the withdrawal of the Consul at Tiflis. The noble Lord had pointed out how very important it was when difficulties arose in these distant places that this country should have a trustworthy representative who would inform the Government as to what was likely to take place, and that could not be effected if we withdrew our Consuls. He admitted that on a former occasion the right hon. Gentleman was unable to give a full explanation, because a reduction of his salary having been moved he was precluded from going into the whole question. Now that there was nothing to prevent the right hon. Gentleman from entering into the question, and he hoped the Committee would be told what had been done and what it was intended to do with regard to the matter.

*MR. BRODRICK: I do not desire to pass over what fell from my noble friend, who takes the greatest interest in this part of Asia, but when my hon. friend urges me to give a full explanation as to what has been done and what it is intended to do he is rather asking for a statement of policy. The history of Asia Minor during the last few months has really been no history at all, and that certainly is, from the point of view of Her Majesty's Government, most desirable. Whatever might be the influence of our Consuls as a restraining force in those regions, we certainly desire nothing better for those regions than that they should enjoy quiet government, and that, as a matter of fact, there should be no call for the exercise of the influence of our Consuls. I have been strongly urged to make a statement with regard to the concession made to Russia in respect of railways in Asia Minor. That was an understanding between the Turkish and the Russian Governments, and it was, I believe, a self-denying ordinance on the part of Turkey to the effect that, if they did not make certain railways themselves, they would give the offer to another Power who was their neighbour. As far as the Government are concerned, they had no idea of any wholesale withdrawal of Consuls in Asia Minor, as has been suggested. We fully recognise the advantages which their presence has given, and, with due regard to the very heavy and increasing claims upon them, we hope to pursue the present policy with advantage.

Question put, and agreed to.

10. £167,186, to complete the sum for Uganda, Central and East Africa Protectorates, and Uganda Railway.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said he did not wish to repeat what he had said at an earlier period of the session on the subject of Uganda; he merely desired to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs when the Uganda Report was likely to be in their hands. It was most unfortunate that this Vote should be discussed before the Report was in the hands of the Committee.

*MR. BRODRICK: I am afraid we cannot give the right hon. Baronet any information upon that point, for this reason: Sir Harry Johnstone has been unfortunately laid up with an attack of fever, from which he is only just recovering, and this has delayed the writing of the Report. I very much doubt whether it will be ready in time for a discussion this session.

SIR BRAMPTON GURDON (Norfolk, N.): I hope I shall be in order in referring to the removal of the native troops from Uganda to Somaliland, and asking for the Papers relating to such removal.

MR. BRODRICK: I do not think there are any Papers whatever in regard to this matter. The regiment is now in Somaliland.

Vote agreed to.

11. £256,955, to complete the sum for Colonial Services.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: The Secretary of State for the Colonies is not present at the moment, and I do not know if there is any member of the Government who can answer the question I wish to put as to the number of cases where duties have been increased in the West Indies. We are granting money in aid of these colonies, and yet the traders are charged increased duties in some cases on British goods. The number of colonies in which the duties have been increased is not known to me, but I know of some that have been raised from 12 to 25 per cent.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The question which the right hon. Gentleman puts I am unable to answer; perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will put it down in the form of a question to the Colonial Secretary.

Vote agreed to.

12. £1,000, to complete the sum for Cyprus (Grant-in-aid).

MR. PIERPOINT (Warrington) desired to know whether any progress had been made with regard to the conversion of the Crimean loan of 1855, a loan which intimately affected the question before the Committee. The arrangements for the conversion of the loan were come to two years ago, and although he had asked questions on various occasions with regard to the matter, he had never received more than a postponing answer. He desired to know whether the conversion of the loan would benefit Cyprus or not. He wished to know, first, whether the arrangements entered into two years ago for the conversion of the loan had been ratified, or whether they had been, or were going to be, considered, and whether the arrangement, if ratified, would have any good effect upon the island of Cyprus.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): In answer to the question, the hon. Gentleman, I think, is probably aware that negotiations have taken place between the Government and the Turkish Government. We have always been anxious to get terms which would be satisfactory, but up to the present we have not been able to obtain from the Porte the terms which we could accept. I do not think the case is quite hopeless; we have arrived nearly at an agreement, but at present all I can say is that no agreement has been arrived at, and I do not know that one will be arrived at in the immediate future. But I will point out to my hon. friend once more that I do not think this is a matter in which he is much interested. He is concerned on behalf of Cyprus, and I have told him before and I will tell him again, that if we made the best possible arrangement with the port as to the conversion of the loan it would not benefit Cyprus in the least.

MR. PIERPOINT pointed out that whilst every year it was said there was a deficiency with regard to Cyprus, that fact arose through the island paying the debts of the Porte to France and to this country. Among the first things hypothesized to the repayment of the loan of 1855 were the customs duties of Smyrna and Syria and the balance of the Egyptian tribute. But the customs duties of Smyrna and Syria not being available, what had been done was to take the tribute from Cyprus, and from that pay the debt, the result being that for twenty years Cyprus had been paying the debt to this country and France. France benefited to the extent of £40,000 and this country to the extent of £10,000 a year. So that, in fact, instead of receiving, as was constantly said, £30,000 a year, Cyprus paid £60,000 to this country and to France.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I admire the tenacity of my hon. friend, and I fear it is hopeless to convince him, after what has taken place on previous occasions, that he is mistaken, and I would not refer to the expression he used at all but for the fact that these continual discussions are repeated in Cyprus, and have the effect there of making the people believe they are badly treated by Great Britain; and when a gentleman of the authority and position of my hon. friend confirms that statement it is difficult to persuade them that really the rule of Great Britain has been of enormous benefit and advantage. Therefore, I must repeat, Cyprus has no claim whatever in this matter. Cyprus was in the position of a tributary to the Porte. When we took over the island a commission was appointed to decide the average amount of the tribute. That was the liability which we took over with Cyprus. If we had nothing to do with Cyprus we would still be under the liability to pay this tribute to the Porte. It does not matter one brass farthing to Cyprus what becomes of the tribute after it has been collected. It has no concern in the distribution of the money. When we came into possession we undertook to pay this money to the Porte in the first instance, but it was convenient to intercept it for the payment of the debtors of the Porte; and therefore a large proportion of it went to France which now has a much better security for its debt, and we took the balance. The hon. Member said that this country made money out of Cyprus. That is absolutely a mistake. We do not make a farthing. On the contrary, Cyprus costs us every year a varying sum—£18,000 one year and £30,000 another year. And we do what the Porte could never have done. We are now engaged on harbour works, railway works, and irrigation works. We have pledged our credit for a sum of £60,000; and we are employed on experimental irrigation works which promise extremely well, and which I hope will justify a larger expenditure in future. The taxation has been rearranged, being made less arbitrary and oppressive; and although we have not done all that we might have done, we effected a considerable improvement in the condition of the island. In tribute, Cyprus does not pay one penny more to us than she would have done if the Porte still had authority in the island.

Vote then agreed to.

13. £14,350, to complete the sum for Subsidies to Telegraph Companies.

Mr. J. Chamberlain.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that in a recent debate which took place on the subject of telegraphs the strategic cables which were those subsidised, and which were the subject of this Vote, were the object of some remarks, and the Government were then asked whether their attention had been called to the desirability of landing the cables which joined us to them on the Irish coast, where the water was deep, rather than on the coast of Cornwall, where the water was for a long way out very shallow. Obviously it would be very much easier to cut a cable which was laid in shallow water than if the water was deep. He pointed out that the companies interested in the Vote had issued a circular in which they alleged that it was just as easy to cut a cable laid in deep water as in shallow, but in the recent debate he had not spoken without taking the highest opinion upon the subject, and that opinion was entirely and directly opposed to the opinion of the telegraph companies. He merely desired now to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Admiralty to the matter, so that they might consider the advisability of landing these cables on the Irish coast.

MR. HANBURY: The question has been considered both by the Admiralty and the War Office not so much with regard to the cables to which the right hon. Baronet calls attention now, but with regard to the general question. The whole question of landing these cables in deep water has been considered.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to move that the House do now adjourn. It has long been the rule that Private Members' Orders should not be taken on an evening devoted to Supply, and I think that the same rule should apply to the Government Orders also.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Balfour)—put, and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Eleven of the clock till Monday next.

CHINA — ANTI-FOREIGN DISTURBANCES—RECENT OPERATIONS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : Seeing the noble Marquess at the head of the Government in his place, I wish to ask him whether he can give us the latest news of the state of affairs in China.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) : I do not think we have any news which I can call of an interesting character. The Admiral has come back to Tientsin—this news comes through the Japanese boats—and we do not know exactly what grounds he had for coming back or what his intentions are. Also the Taku forts have been attacked, as I think your Lordships have seen in the newspapers, but we have not received any information of any result from that movement. I very much wish I could give the noble Earl fuller information, because it is naturally a matter which has created everywhere the utmost anxiety, both in this country and others. At present all we have been able to do is to inform those who represent us that their discretion is absolute, and to forward as many troops as we can.

MARRIAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY : My Lords, this is a Bill which has been before your Lordships on more than one occasion, and has passed through this House, but has not become law simply for lack of time to consider it in another place. It does not, therefore, require so full an explanation as might have been necessary if the Bill had been entirely new. On the contrary, there is very little that is new in it. I need not say much about the first three clauses, the second clause being an interpretation clause and the third merely a repetition of the law as it at present stands. The fourth clause deals with a matter which is rather troublesome to the clergy, and it has already been agreed to by your Lordships. At present there are two rubrics relating to the publication of banns of marriage which are somewhat inconsistent with one another, and it is sometimes thought that the clergy are bound by the one rubric and sometimes it is thought by the other. There is one rubric after the Nicene Creed which speaks of the proper time for publishing banns of marriage as immediately after that creed; and there is another rubric before the form of service for marriage which speaks of the proper time for the publication of banns as immediately after the Second Lesson. But it has never been settled in a court of law which of the two is the right interpretation. It is not really worth while to insist upon either, and this clause—which provides that the time for publishing banns shall be on Sundays, not earlier than the hour of nine in the morning after the Nicene Creed, or after the Second Lesson at Morning Prayer; and that if there is no Morning Prayer or Holy Communion the banns shall be published at Evening Prayer—will get rid of the difficulty by leaving it to the clergy themselves to decide what is the proper time for the publication of banns. To this I cannot conceive that there can be any objection. The fifth clause empowers the two Archbishops, with the consent of the Convocations and subject to the approval of Her Majesty the Queen, to alter the rubrics to correspond with what the Bill proposes to enact. The sixth clause is the most operative part of the Bill. It proposes that when the banns shall have been published, in the same way as they are published now, the marriage may be solemnised at any church in the diocese wherein the banns have been published. At present the marriage must be solemnised in the church in which the banns have been published; or, if they have been published in two churches, as is very often the case, in one of those two churches. But this has been found to give rise to great inconvenience, and there is now no reason for maintaining the restriction. It is thought very much better that it should be left open to the parties who desire to be married to go to any church in the diocese they choose where the minister is willing to celebrate the marriage. In applying for the banns to be published the parties will have to state in what church they propose to get married. There can, therefore, be no concealment in the matter, and there is absolutely no danger of a clandestine marriage resulting from the restriction being repealed. The restriction was introduced in 1723 by the well-known Act of Lord Hardwicke, and has continued to the present day. Before Lord Hardwicke's Act it was open to persons desirous of being married to go to any other church in the diocese than that in which the banns had been published, and I think it is better on the whole that we should go back to that practice, now that the need for the restriction has passed away. Clause 7 deals with marriages of seamen, who are frequently put to considerable inconvenience owing to there being no recognised mode of publishing their banns. Often a sailor comes home and wishes to marry immediately, because, soon after, he will have to leave on another voyage. This clause provides that the banns of a seaman may be published in any church of the parish in which he usually dwells when not at sea, or, if his ship be in port, in any church within five miles of the ship. The eighth clause requires the parties applying for the publication of their banns to make a definite statement in writing containing those necessary particulars which hitherto the clergyman, generally speaking, has had to ascertain for himself. This will be a great relief to the clergyman. The ninth clause deals with marriage by licence, and provides that a marriage may be solemnised upon a licence duly issued from the registry of the Archbishop or Bishop of the diocese, and whether granted in the registry or through a surrogate, in any church within the diocese, provided one of the parties to be married under such licence shall have had his or her usual place of abode within the diocese for fifteen days before the granting of the licence, or upon a licence duly issued from the registry of an archdeaconry—which is allowable in certain cases—in any church in any archdeaconry where such licences have been hitherto issued. In short, it gives the same liberty in respect to marriages by licence as Clause 6 gives in respect to marriages by banns. The tenth clause deals with marriages of seamen by licence, and the eleventh clause simply preserves the right of the Master of the Faculties and the Vicar-General of the Archbishop of Canterbury to grant licences. Under the twelfth clause applicants are required to state precisely the names, descriptions, and usual place or places of abode of both parties and the name of the church in which the marriage is intended to be solemnised. When it is proposed to solemnise the marriage in a church in a parish in which neither of the parties have had his or her usual place of abode for fifteen days immediately before the granting of the licence, on the day such licence is granted notice will have to be sent by the person who obtained it to the minister of the church in which the marriage is to be solemnised. The fourteenth clause provides for the marriage of persons residing in canal or river boats or other movable dwellings, and proposes that, where either of the persons to be married shall be residing in a movable dwelling, the banns may be published in a church or chapel of the ecclesiastical parish in which the movable dwelling is at the time of the first publication of the banns, and a licence may be granted for the marriage of such person in any church or chapel in the diocese in which the movable dwelling is at the time of the granting of the licence. The fifteenth clause is a very important one, because it fixes the fees for marriages. In fixing the fees it is, of course, to be understood that there is no desire to prevent the parties who are married from giving very much more than the fee which is required of them. That is done at present in a very large number of cases, and there is no reason to discourage the practice. But at the same time it is of some importance that the fee which can be legally demanded should be the same in the church as in the registration office. There can be no question that in certain cases people do go to the registration office rather than to the church, because the fees in the church of the parish where they live are higher than the fees in the registration office. The sixteenth clause is nothing more than a repetition of the law at it is at present, and the next clause provides that any false statement made knowingly by the parties shall be punishable as a misdemeanour. It is at present difficult to deal with false statements because they are not always reduced to writing. I have had some rather bad cases in which licences particularly have been obtained by false affidavits, and I have found that it was not possible to deal with these false affidavits at all. Clause 18 reserves the right of the Royal Family, and Clause 19 simply repeals certain clauses in former Acts which will be inconsistent with this Act. Of course, the clause might be omitted altogether, because this Act will repeal the clauses referred to ipso facto; but it is better that they should be distinctly inserted in order that the clergy may know exactly how these clauses stand. I believe, my Lords, that the Bill, if passed, will be of considerable advantage in many ways, that it will get rid of a great deal of friction, and that it will remove much discomfort and distress; and I feel very confident that nothing in it will give rise to any kind of abuse. I beg to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): My Lords, I rise, not for the purpose of asking your Lordships to reject this Bill, but to preserve my right to criticise the Bill in Committee. The marriage laws of the country are so extremely important that without great consideration we ought not to alter them. I think the most rev. Prelate has undervalued the effect of Lord Hardwicke's Act, which was passed to get rid of a mischievous and scandalous state of the law, and to remove a number of evils to which it is not necessary now to allude. I confess that I have some doubt about the repeal of that part of Lord Hardwicke's Act to which the most rev. Prelate has referred. The whole object of publishing the banns in the churches in which the marriage is to be solemnised is to give information to those who are likely to know the parties who are going to be married. The most rev. Prelate now proposes to get rid of that provision. He proposes in the Bill that the parties shall state the church in which the marriage shall be solemnised, but he gets rid of the obligation to do it. There is no fortifying, as it were, of the provisions of the Bill. I cannot say at present that I have made up my mind whether or not this is too important an alteration of the law to be allowed to pass, but it is an alteration which requires very careful consideration.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: This is a matter which might well be considered in Committee of the full House, and I move that the Standing Committee be negatived.

Moved, "That the Standing Committee be negatived."—(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: As Chairman of the Standing Committee I should deprecate very much a Bill of this kind not going to that Committee. In my opinion it is a Bill which it is very desirable should be considered by the Standing Committee.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: I agree with the noble Earl. I do not think the motion is one to which the House can agree.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

BURIAL AUTHORITIES (CREMATION) BILL [H.L.].

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD MONKSWELL: My Lords, this is a Bill to enable burial authorities to provide and maintain places and necessary appliances for cremation. There are several safeguards introduced in the Bill. In the first place, the plans of places for cremation must be approved by the Secretary of State, who must also approve of all the bye-laws to be made under this Bill, and after having approved of them he may at any time require them to be submitted to him for revision or modification. It is proposed in the Bill that the bye-laws shall prescribe in what cases, in what mode, and under what conditions cremation may take place, and may prescribe the forms of the certificates and declarations to be given or made before cremation is permitted to take place. Clause 6 provides penalties for a breach of the bye-laws; Clause 7 deals with fees, which are to be approved by the Secretary of State; and the last clause provides that the Act shall not interfere with the jurisdiction of any coroners under the Coroners Act, 1887, or any Act amending the same, nor authorise the Burial Board or other local authority to create or permit a nuisance. The principle of cremation has been sanctioned over and over again by the Legislature, and all that this Bill proposes to do is to enable burial authorities to raise rates for the purpose of cremation without having to go to Parliament for a private Act. If no question of rating is involved cremation is perfectly legal at present. The principle of burning the bodies of dead persons is certainly gaining ground in public favour. The corporations of Manchester, Glasgow, Liverpool, and Hull have already obtained private Acts giving them powers to provide and maintain places for the carrying out of cremation, and at the present moment the corporation of the City of London have a Bill before your Lordships' House in which they ask for similar powers. I am informed that the revenue from cremations is steadily increasing, so much so that the Cremation Society now possesses a moderate surplus. I have been asked whether the Act is intended to apply to Scotland or Ireland. As the Bill at present stands, I think it would not so apply, because it merely amends the Burial Acts, and I am unable to discover any Burial Acts which apply to Scotland or Ireland of the kind dealt with in this Bill. But if it is thought better I will, in Committee, consent to an Amendment taking Scotland and Ireland specifically out of the purview of the Bill. The Bill is supported by the London County Council and is not treated by them as a party matter, both parties having approved of its principle.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Monkswell.)

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: This Bill raises very serious questions, and involves some considerations which may be local and some which are of a wide general character. I do not rise to oppose the Bill. On the contrary, it seems to me that this is a question on which there ought to be some general law to regulate cremations, whether carried out by private Act or not; and in any Act passed on the subject, of course it would be understood that, being an Act of general operation, it would overrule those cremation Acts which have already been obtained. All the provisions of this Bill will have to be very carefully considered.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

House adjourned at Five of the clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four of the clock.

Return ordered, "giving the following particulars of the results of the Marriage Act, 1898, during the year ended the 31st day of March, 1900—

"1. Number of 'registered buildings' for which 'authorised persons' have been appointed under Section 6 of the Act, classified according to religious denominations as follows: Wesleyan Methodists, Primitive Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists, other denominations ;

"2. Number of 'authorised persons' so appointed ;

"3. Number of marriages which have taken place under the Act ;

4. "Number of cases in which there have been serious irregularities by 'authorised persons' in connection with the marriage certificates."—(Mr. Price.)

QUESTIONS.SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—SIEGE OF LADYSMITH—CLAIM AGAINST THE MAYOR.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Imperial authorities have presented a bill for several thousands of pounds to the Mayor of Ladysmith for food for the inhabitants during the siege ; and whether payment is to be insisted upon.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): I have no information on the matter.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the hon. Gentleman obtain the information ?

MR. WYNDHAM: I do not think so. This is a matter well within the competence of the commanding officers in South Africa. It seems to me, on the face of it, to be a mere question of book-keeping. Clearly an officer cannot issue stores to civilians without entering the fact. The whole question of indemnity is a very large one, and will, I am sure, be considered in a generous spirit later on.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I will put down another question later.

CASUALTY LISTS—4TH SHERWOOD FORESTERS MILITIA.

MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the casualty list of the 4th Sherwood Foresters Militia Battalion has been received ; and, if so, when it will be published.

MR. WYNDHAM: Some of the casualties were published on the 12th June and some on the 16th June. A complete list has not yet been forwarded from South Africa, but it will be published as soon as it arrives, in conformity with uniform practice.

MR. YOXALL: Will the hon. Gentleman, seeing that these casualties took place eleven days ago, wire out for those affecting the rank and file ?

MR. WYNDHAM: The only effect of doing so would be probably to cause further delay. These casualties are collected and telegraphed with the utmost possible expedition, and the hon. Member must remember that for four days we could get no information at all from Lord Roberts.

FARQUHAR'S FARM ENGAGEMENT—STRENGTH OF THE 60TH RIFLES.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether a field-state showing the numbers and composition of the battalion of the 60th Rifles engaged at Farquhar's Farm, near Lombard's Kop, on Monday, the 31st October, is in the possession of the War Office; what number of officers was present with the battalion; and how many of them had been with the battalion for at least two years.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I am unable to give the right hon. Member this information, as the field-states are not sent to the War Office.

SETTLEMENT OF SOLDIERS IN SOUTH AFRICA AFTER THE WAR.

MR. ARNOLD - FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any arrangement has been made for the settlement of properly qualified soldiers in South Africa at the close of the present war; and, if so, whether it is proposed to form any organisation in South Africa for the purpose of giving effect to the intentions of the Government in this respect.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The matter is receiving the earnest consideration of Her Majesty's Government. I am in communication with Sir A. Milner on the subject, and an inter-Departmental Committee is about to be appointed with representatives of the War Office, Treasury, and Colonial Office, to deal with the subject.

OFFICERS' ESTATES AND THE DEATH DUTIES.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government have come to any decision regarding the remission of the death duties to widows of those officers who have lost their lives in the service of their country during the present war.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The hon. Member will find the result of the consideration of this subject embodied in section 14 of the Finance Act of this year.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—EXTENSION TO NAVAL AND MILITARY SERVANTS—WAR RELIEF FUNDS COMMITTEE.

MR. M'KENNA (Monmouthshire, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the need to make adequate provision for the widows and orphans of soldiers killed in the war, he can now state the steps the Government propose to take in pursuance of the resolution of the House of 1st May, 1900.*

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Government quite recognise the necessity for further arrangements making adequate provision for the widows of soldiers and sailors. They propose to take immediate steps to frame a scheme for carrying out that object.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): Will the House be afforded an opportunity of discussing the recommendations of Lord Justice Collins's Committee? You propose to take the opportunity I have obtained for to-morrow.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt every hon. Member would be tolerant of his day being taken away if another were found for him; but to set apart a day for the discussion of this Report would be an exceptional proceeding, which I do not feel justified, in the circumstances, in taking.

MR. KEARLEY: Will the right hon. Gentleman give us the opportunity of discussing the proposals he intends to submit to the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If they are submitted to the House there will be an opportunity for discussing the Government proposals, but I can make no promise with regard to them.

PENSIONS FOR DISCHARGED WOUNDED AND SICK SOLDIERS.

SIR J. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will inform the House to what extent the powers of the Chelsea Commissioners have been enlarged recently to admit of a higher scale of pension being accorded to men incapacitated by wounds or disease contracted on service.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devonshire, Honiton): At the same time may I ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state what bonus, gratuity, or pension soldiers invalided home through wounds or sickness receive on their discharge from the service.

* See The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxii., p. 489.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The cases of all soldiers discharged on account of wounds or sickness are decided by the Chelsea Commissioners, who assign pensions according to the nature of the injury, the soldier's rank, and the duration of his service, within the rates laid down by the Pay Warrant. These rates, for non-commissioned officers and men wholly disabled by wounds, run from 1s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. a day; for men partially disabled, from 6d. to 3s. a day. The recent extension of the powers of the Chelsea Commissioners refers only to cases of men disabled by disease. Formerly the rates of pension which could be granted in such cases depended entirely on rank and length of service, and the maximum for a private was 8d. a day. By Army Order 75, issued on the 1st of April, the maximum was raised to 1s. for privates, and the Chelsea Commissioners were empowered to determine the rate in accordance with the circumstances of each case.

TRAINED DOGS FOR OUTPOST DUTY.

GENERAL RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that for a number of years past in several Continental armies numbers of dogs have been specially trained for the purpose of assisting in outpost duty, and whether, in view of the repeated cases of surprises that have occurred during the present war, the Government will seriously consider the expediency of following in this respect the example of these foreign military powers.

*MR. WYNDHAM: This proposal will be carefully examined in addition to others which the experience of the war has suggested.

RESERVE OF ARMS.

MR. GOULDING (Wiltshire, Devizes): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the 2nd Volunteer Battalion Wiltshire Regiment, H Company, who are now 142 strong as against 70 last year, have only 80 rifles at present, and whether, seeing that the adjutant indentured for extra rifles early in April, he will receive them without further delay in order that the drill may be efficiently conducted.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The demand for these arms was only sent to Weedon on the 8th instant, and the arms have now been despatched. The delay was caused by the neglect of a clerk in the Ordnance Office in the Southern District, and he has been punished.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): Will the hon. Gentleman see that the Royal Reserves are armed before any more rifles are issued to the Volunteers?

*MR. WYNDHAM: There seems to be some misunderstanding. There is an ample supply of rifles in the country, although the issue may in some cases have been delayed owing to application having been made in the wrong quarter.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Is it not the fact that in consequence of not having received their rifles the Royal Reserves were unable to parade on the Queen's birthday?

*MR. WYNDHAM: Some of these regiments were only formed a few days before the Queen's birthday.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: For one year.

ALDERSHOT MANŒUVRES—HEAT FATALITIES—ARMY CLOTHING.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state what were the losses amongst the troops engaged in the field day at Aldershot last Monday, how many hours the troops were engaged in the operations during the excessive heat, what rations were served out to them during the day, and whether the Commander-in-Chief at Aldershot was with the troops on that day; and whether, in future, care will be taken that troops in ordinary uniform and with head gear unsuitable as a protection from the sun shall not engage in field days during the excessive heat.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The General Officer commanding at Aldershot was with the troops. On the other points in the question I must refer my hon. friend to the full reply I gave to similar questions put on Friday, the 15th instant.† As I mentioned then, each regiment engaged in the operation has been called on to report what arrangements were made both for giving the men breakfast before they started and for providing refreshments during the day; and the following has been received from the General Officer commanding at Aldershot—

“With reference to your telegram of the 16th June, 1900, I have the honour to report as follows:—

“1. Reports received from commanding officers state that all men had breakfast before starting for the field day on the 11th inst.

“2. Light refreshments were actually supplied and carried by every unit, some in the haversack, but in the majority of cases in transport carts.

“3. The only units that did not receive their refreshments on the ‘cease fire’ sounding were the 5th Worcester Regiment and the 4th Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers.

“In the case of the 5th Worcester Regiment the officer commanding reports that the cart conveying the refreshments went astray during the operations.

“As regards the 4th Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers, the commanding officer reports that a contractor had undertaken to supply the battalion with bread and cheese. At the hour of the departure of the battalion he failed to appear. A mule cart was then loaded with the refreshments, but, owing to the driver not being acquainted with the locality in which the operations took place, the cart unfortunately did not turn up.”

MR. JEFFREYS: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that at the inquest on one of the men it was stated that the contractor had orders to take out supplies but failed to do so, that another cart was then sent out to try and find the contractor, which also failed, and that certainly in the case of one regiment, if not more, no food was supplied.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I suppose that that regiment is one of the two referred to.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): May I ask whether the final decision of the Secretary of State upon the whole of the business will be laid on the Table of the House before the Vote is taken for the War Office.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I do not quite understand what the right hon. Gentleman means by the final decision.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: I understood the Secretary of State had instituted an inquiry into the circumstances and called for a report, upon which I presume the noble Marquess will express an opinion.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I imagine that the matter is narrowed down to two points—namely, headdress—as to which I gave information on Friday—and light refreshments, as to which I have just given information.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: Is there to be no further statement in explanation of the catastrophe?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I shall be pleased to expand my statement if the right hon. Gentleman will indicate on what lines he wishes me to proceed. I do not see that I have anything to add.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): With regard to the question of headdress, may I ask whether the old forage cap of the British Army was not capable of having a sunshade put over it, and whether the troops did not go all over India at the time of the Mutiny with that headdress.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The questions are now developing into a debate.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Is there to be no inquiry into the circumstances, and no court-martial?

MR. JEFFREYS: Will the contractor who failed to carry out his contract be punished in any way?

*MR. WYNDHAM: There has been an inquiry, and it is for the House to determine whether that inquiry was not sufficiently exhaustive. For my part I feel that we are departing very widely from decentralisation by taking out of the hands of the officers in command matters with which they are perfectly competent to deal. I think we should risk much in assuming that any officer in command does not realise to the full the great responsibility which rests upon him.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Did not the same thing happen in 1878?

COLONEL SANDYS (Lancashire, Bootle) also rose and put a question.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The question on the Paper has already been fully answered.

MILITIA OFFICERS' TRAINING ALLOWANCES.

MR. LOWE (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the mess allowance of 4s. a day, hitherto granted to quartermasters of Militia during the period of annual training, has been withdrawn on the embodiment of their regiments; and, if so, whether, in view of the fact that these officers are put to much extra expense on being detached from their permanent stations, the Secretary of State for War can see his way to authorise the allowance to be granted in the same manner as during the annual training period.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I must refer my hon. friend to a reply to a similar question put by my hon. and gallant friend the Member for the Pembroke and Haverfordwest District on the 17th May.† I then explained that the mess allowance was inadmissible, but that a money grant as compensation for disturbance would be considered; and on the 26th of May‡ Lord Lansdowne stated in another place that he proposed to make such a grant. The details have not yet been settled.

MR. WARNER: Does that apply to adjutants?

*MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, to all the permanent staff.

CHANNEL FLEET--VISIT TO SHETLAND.

SIR LEONARD LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty will he explain why, although a portion of the German fleet has repeatedly visited Shetland in the course of its summer cruise, and quite recently a squadron of warships, including several large battleships, spent several days in Lerwick Harbour, where a body of our Naval Reserve men get their training, British warships of any size hardly ever visit Shetland, and are believed to purposely avoid navigating the seas there; whether he will take steps so that the Royal Naval Reserve men of Shetland shall have an opportunity of seeing a British fleet, and not derive their ideas of a Navy solely from foreign fleets; and will he order the Channel Fleet to visit Shetland this year in [the course of its summer cruise, a visit which has been often asked for in past years.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Although Lerwick has not been visited by the Channel Squadron of late years the Training Squadron has frequently done so, the last three occasions being 1895, 1896, 1899. Kirkwall, which possesses a better and more convenient harbour, seems to have been preferred by the officers commanding the Channel Squadron during their visits to northern waters. It is possible that the Squadron, or a portion of it, may visit Lerwick when the Squadron is again in the north, but I can give no undertaking that an opportunity will occur during the present year. I may remind the hon. Gentleman of my answer to a similar question last year, that the visits of Her Majesty's ships to particular ports must be determined by service considerations alone.

ASHANTI--NATIVE RISING--INVESTMENT OF COOMASSIE.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) had on the Paper the following question:—To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can say who is responsible for the deficiency both of provisions and ammunition among the British garrison of Coomassie; and whether he can state why a larger relief force was not despatched to Coomassie over a month ago. The hon. Member was not, however, in his place to put it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not think this question ought to remain on the Paper unanswered, because it seems to imply a state of things which is not correct. Reserves of food and ammunition for 300 men for three months were kept in Coomassie, and this was considered by the local authorities, who are responsible, to be sufficient. On the first intimation of the rebellion a much larger force than the local authorities then considered necessary was sent to the Gold Coast, but owing to the reluctance of the Gold Coast natives to engage as carriers, and to the extraordinary difficulties created by the heavy rains, the advance of the relieving column has been delayed. I am in constant communication with Colonel Willcocks and the local Government as to the best mode of dealing with the situation thus created and its possible developments. I may add that it is due to the energy of the Governor of Sierra Leone, Sir Frederic Cardew, that we have been able to send to the Gold Coast 3,000 odd carriers from Sierra Leone, and that, generally, we have in every case endeavoured to send to the Gold Coast more, and not less, both of stores and of men than have been requisitioned by the local authorities.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN MOVEMENT—RECENT OPERATIONS.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Is there any information that can be given to the House with regard to the state of affairs in China?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): We have no news from Sir Claude MacDonald later than the 12th instant, but nothing has reached us to confirm the rumour of a general attack on the legations at Peking. The latest telegram from Admiral Seymour's force is dated 13th instant, the telegraph to Tientsin having been cut. A Japanese man-of-war which arrived at Chefoo last night from Ta-ku reported that the commander-in-chief and troops had returned to Tientsin. The Ta-ku forts opened fire on gunboats in the mouth of the river on Sunday at 12.30 a.m.; the ships then engaged the forts, and the engagement was proceeding when the Japanese ship left at 5.30 a.m. Detachments from all the ships of war were landed on Saturday to protect Ta-ku. There was one Chinese ship of war at Ta-ku remaining passive. As regards reinforcements, the British troops from Hong Kong will reach Ta-ku on Thursday. We understand that Russian, French, and Japanese reinforcements are due about the same date. Additional British ships are on their way from Manila and Hong Kong. I need hardly say that no effort is being spared to get in touch with the Admiral, and to give him every support in our power. In the last hour we have heard that telegraphic communication has been re-established with Ta-ku and Tientsin via Helampo, north of Manchuria.

MR. YERBURGH: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question of which I have sent him private notice—namely, whether it is the intention of the Government to send native troops from India to reinforce the garrison of Hong Kong?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The answer to my hon. friend's question is in the affirmative.

MOROCCO—SUGGESTED EUROPEAN INTERVENTION.

MR. HAZELL (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the present condition of affairs in Morocco, which it is alleged is such that the leading and intelligent classes of Morocco would welcome some form of European authority that would secure justice to the inhabitants; and whether the time has come when Her Majesty's Government, as representing the country possessing the largest trade interest in Morocco, would consider the advisability of calling a conference of the Powers with a view to the establishment of some concerted European influence over the Moorish Government, in order that the present form of government which prevails, under which open slave markets flourish, may be brought more in conformity with the civilisation of the times.

*MR. BRODRICK: No information has been received which would lead to the belief that European authority would be welcomed in Morocco. The answer to the second paragraph is in the negative. The orders to the Governors of coast towns to prevent the public sale of slaves were renewed in 1898 at the request of Her Majesty's Minister, who will make representations to the Moorish Government if it should at any time come to his knowledge that these orders are being neglected.

EAST INDIA RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether it has been brought to his notice that the East Indian Railway Company, which is guaranteed by the Indian Government in respect of its interest, has recently placed orders in Germany for wheels and axles instead of in Sheffield, and if the representative of the Government or the Board will be instructed to urge that the shipments shall at least be effected on British ships.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): My honourable friend is aware that the Secretary of State, although he is represented upon the boards of the guaranteed Indian railways, does not control the management or working of the lines. I am informed that for business reasons, as well as on patriotic grounds, a decided preference is given as a rule to goods of English manufacture; but in this case the difference in price, amounting to about £12,350 between Messrs. Krupp's tender and the lowest available English tender, was so great as to make it impossible to adhere to the usual practice. The principles which govern the acceptance of tenders for goods apply equally to tenders for freight. I do not propose to give any special instructions on this occasion, but I have no doubt that British shipping will be employed, unless its employment would involve an unreasonable charge upon the company.

BRITISH TRADE WITH THE SOUDAN.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state the volume and value of British exports and imports to and from the Soudan since the battle of Omdurman.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): Statistics of British exports and imports to and from the Soudan are included in the returns of trade with India, and no separate figures can at present be given. Such information as is available as to the trade of the Soudan since the battle of Omdurman is contained in the report by Lord Cromer, Egypt, No. 1 (1900).

RAILWAY COMPANIES AND PASSENGERS' PERSONAL LUGGAGE.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the intention of the railway companies, in some cases already put into practice, of enforcing charges for passengers' luggage when exceeding a low maximum weight; and whether in view of the inconvenience to the travelling public, especially at holiday times, and of the hardship to people of small means, the Board of Trade will undertake to make suggestions to the railway companies with a view to inducing them to discontinue or largely modify their charges.

The following questions also appeared on the Paper:—

SIR CAMERON GULL (Devonshire, Barnstaple): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the joint notice recently issued by the railway companies stating that from 1st May passengers are to be allowed only the following quantity of personal luggage free, namely—first class, 120 lb.; second class, 100 lb.; third class, 60 lb.; and that any excess will be charged for; and whether in view of the fact that under their statutes several companies, either on the whole or on certain parts of their systems, are bound to allow a greater quantity of luggage free, he will take steps to see that these companies do not continue to make these charges, and will require them to display in a prominent place in their stations the amount of free luggage to which each class of passenger is entitled on the various sections of their lines, and the charges which are to be made for any excess.

SIR CAMERON GULL: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that though passengers on the South Eastern and Chatham Railway are entitled to 120 lb. free luggage first class and 100 lb. second class, the company is charging, as regards its through Continental traffic, 6d. each package for registration, and 1s. 1d. for each 10 lb. or part of 10 lb. over 96 lb., while if a bicycle is carried it is not only charged for separately, but is also weighed in with the passenger's luggage and charged for again; and whether, if this is so, he will communicate with the company with the view of putting an end to such charges.

MR. RITCHIE: I will answer the questions of the hon. Members for the Barnstaple Division of Devonshire and the Elland Division of Yorkshire at the same time. Although the Board of Trade have no power to regulate the amount of or charges for passengers' luggage they are very sensible of the importance of the question and of the confusion and irritation which will certainly arise as soon as the holiday season commences. The Board will therefore at once communicate with the Railway Association on the subject. The Department will also address a letter to the South Eastern Company upon the special point affecting that company which has been raised by the hon. Baronet.

EDUCATION OF POOR LAW CHILDREN.

MR. TREVELYAN: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state how many boards of guardians send their poor law children to public elementary schools; whether this practice is advocated by the Department; also, how many boards send their children to the public elementary schools, and keep them in the workhouse out of school hours in contact with the adult paupers.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): According to the latest returns 508 boards of guardians send their children to public elementary schools. This practice has for many years past been strongly advocated by the Local Government Board. I am not in a position to give any precise information on the point referred to in the last part of the question, but I may state that in the more populous unions the children are kept in buildings separate from the rest of the paupers, and that in all cases they are required to be treated as a separate class, so that they may be brought as little as possible into contact with the adult paupers.

BOARDING-OUT PAUPER CHILDREN.

MR. TREVELYAN: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can say what number of boards of guardians board out the children chargeable to them within the union, and in how many cases the children are under voluntary committees of management, and in how many cases they depend solely upon inspection by the medical and relieving officers.

MR. CHAPLIN: On the 1st January last 410 boards of guardians boarded out children within the union. In eighty-three unions voluntary committees have been authorised to board out children within the union. Where there is no such committee it devolves upon the medical and relieving officers to make periodical visits and reports with respect to the children.

METROPOLITAN VEHICULAR REGULATIONS.

GENERAL RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the dangers which occur in crowded thoroughfares from the fact that drivers of covered vans are not obliged to have sidelights; whether he is aware that in nearly all Continental capitals there is a strict regulation on this point, and that it is rigidly enforced; and whether he can see his way to have this precaution made also compulsory in London.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): Covered vans from which drivers are unable to see the traffic on either side of them are undoubtedly a danger; but the police have no power to make any regulation on the subject.

REPORT OF THE CHIEF INSPECTOR OF FACTORIES.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the portion of the Annual Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories and Workshops, which was stated to be ready in May, will be distributed to Members.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The whole of the Report was completed and sent to the printers a month ago. The date of its issue now depends entirely on the printers, who have been and will be pressed to expedite the work.

ROMAN CATHOLIC OPEN-AIR PROCESSIONS—DISTURBANCE AT PECKHAM.

COLONEL SANDYS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to an open-air procession of Roman Catholics, some of them being ecclesiastics wearing the habits of their orders and exercising the rites and ceremonies of their religion, which took place at Peckham on Sunday, 27th May; whether such procession took place with the permission of the Chief Commissioner of Police; and whether the powers conferred on the Chief Commissioner of Police as to permitting organised processions in the Metropolitan Police are to override the express statutory prohibition contained in 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, s. 26; and whether the proclamation of 15th June, 1852, drawing attention to the illegality of such open-air processions, is still in force.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The statute referred to does not confer on the Commissioner of Police any power either to consent to or to prohibit such a procession as that mentioned in the question. The duty of the police is simply the ordinary duty of preserving order. The law on the subject is contained in the Act mentioned in the question and not in the proclamation.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): On behalf of the hon. Member for East Cavan, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the attack made on a religious procession in Peckham on the 27th May; whether he is aware that Lieutenant-Colonel Martin Whale, of the Royal Marines, was one of the leaders of the riotous party which attacked the procession; and whether Whale is on full pay, or on half pay, or in receipt of any salary or pension from the War Office; and, if so, what action the War Office has taken in the matter.

*MR. WYNDHAM: This should be addressed to the Admiralty. The War Office has no jurisdiction over the Royal Marines.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am prepared to answer at once. I have seen a newspaper report which gives a summary of the occurrence in question. It is stated that Colonel Whale, a retired officer of Royal Marines, on meeting the religious procession referred to, had shouted a protest, and in consequence, lost his hat, and that he seemed well satisfied with his day's work. The case does not appear to be one that would justify the withholding of retired pay earned by a service of twenty-four years.

UNDERGROUND ELECTRIC CABLE BETWEEN LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM.

SIR J. LENG: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the underground electric cable between London and Birmingham is working satisfactorily, and whether it will be extended northwards, in order to prevent a recurrence of the prolonged interruption of telegraphic communication between England and Scotland caused by last winter's snowstorms.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HANBURY, Preston): The underground telegraph line to Birmingham meets the demand for uninterrupted communication over that part of the country where destructive gales are most prevalent; but it is not at present found to be so generally useful as an overground line, and the Postmaster General cannot at present contemplate its extension to the North.

SUNDAY DUTY IN THE POST OFFICE.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether Sunday duty in the General Post Office, which has hitherto been performed by volunteers, will in future be compulsory on all the staff; whether the work at present done on Sundays is more than can be performed by the number of volunteers at present available; and whether the Post Office authorities are actually removing from Sunday duties those who have volunteered to perform them, and are forcing these duties upon men who conscientiously object to work on Sunday.

MR. HANBURY: Sunday duty will in future be compulsory on all members of the staff of the Circulation Office who entered the service on the condition that they would be liable to such duty. This condition was first imposed in 1898. At present the work on Sundays is more than can be performed by the volunteers available unless some, at any rate, of them attend every Sunday, and regular service seven days a week is not desirable either in the interests of the Department or of the men themselves. Such officers as may desire to avoid attendance on Sundays are at liberty to provide approved substitutes.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): Is there any limit as to this duty?

MR. HANBURY: Does the hon.

Member mean with regard to the number of Sundays or the period of duty?

MR. CHANNING: Both.

MR. HANBURY: A man may not do it more often than every other Sunday, and I believe the duty is limited to five hours.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACT SCHEDULES.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that copies of rate books at present supplied to clerks of unions do not contain the names of lessees and owners, which are essential for the purpose of making out Labourers Act Schedules; and whether as under this system professional men, auctioneers, and other persons have no means of obtaining information required for their business unless at the county offices, and in view of the inconvenience caused to officials and to the general public by the withdrawal of the valuation lists from the offices of the clerks of unions, he would advise the Local Government Board to restore the practice that existed previous to the Local Government Act, 1898.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The new rate books contain only the names of occupiers or of lessees and owners who are liable for rates under Section 52 (1) of the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, and the Local Government Board do not consider that these books should be burdened with additional information which has no connection with the rate, and is merely required in order to enable schedules for the Labourers Acts to be prepared without reference to the valuation lists in the county council offices, and to facilitate "professional men and auctioneers" in their private business—as suggested in the question.

DUBLIN COLLEGE OF SCIENCE AND ART.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that there is a want of employment in Dublin, and whether he can state when the new buildings for the College of Science and Art will be commenced in that city.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am not aware that there is any special want of employment in Dublin at present; and as regards the second part of the question, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. friend the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture to a somewhat similar question put to him on the 26th March,* to which reply I have nothing to add.

RENT CASES IN COUNTY CLARE.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received any complaints as to the delays which have occurred in fixing rents in Clare, and whether he will cause inquiry to be made as to the working of the Land Act in that county.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am not aware that any complaints have been received of the nature mentioned in the question. I am informed that a sub-commission has been continuously at work in disposing of applications to fix fair rents in Clare during the past two years, and that a considerable number of additional cases from the county have been listed for hearing before a sub-commission which will commence its sittings on Friday next. The reply to the second part of the question is in the negative.

THE DISSOLUTION—THE PARLIAM- ENTARY REGISTER.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is proposed to take steps to accelerate the registration of Parliamentary voters this year, so that, in the event of a Dissolution in the late autumn, the General Election may be taken on a new register.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman has apparently access to information about the Dissolution which is not at my disposal. But whatever date the Dissolution may be fixed for, I do not think that any alteration in the registration of voters ought to be preliminary to it.

* See The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxx. p. 331.

WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING BILL.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has received a number of communications from county councils and other public bodies and meetings in Wales appealing to him to give the necessary facilities for passing into law during this session the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill; whether he is aware that this Bill is based upon the unanimous recommendations of the Royal Commission appointed by the Government of which he was a member in 1889; and whether, seeing that this Bill passed its Second Reading without a division on 9th May, and in view of this general consensus of opinion as to its principal provisions, he will endeavour to make such arrangements as will allow the remaining stages of the Bill to be passed this session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is probably as well aware as I am that it is practically impossible to make exceptions in favour of private Members' Bills.

BRITISH MUSEUM—EXTENSION OF BUILDINGS—THE BRITISH MUSEUM BILL.

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the trustees of the British Museum are at present prepared with plans for its extension, and whether they have funds bequeathed to them which may be applied to this purpose.

MR. HANBURY: Under the will of the late Mr. Vincent Stuckey Lean the trustees are entitled to a bequest of £50,000 for "the improvement and extension of the library and reading room." A plan for the extension of the museum which would comply with the terms of the bequest at an estimated cost of £150,000 was put forward by the trustees in 1899. Its consideration has been deferred, as the Bill now before Parliament to authorise the trustees to deposit copies of local newspapers with local authorities and to dispose of valueless printed matter would set free a large amount of space.

MR. J. MORLEY (Montrose): Is it not true that the Treasury wrote to the trustees of the museum in August last informing them that they could not feel justified in acceding to any proposal for the extension of the buildings until an attempt had been made to take the opinion of the House, with a view to giving new authority to the trustees for the disposal of newspapers and other printed matter.

MR. HANBURY: I think my answer implied that.

MR. J. MORLEY: That being so I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will give facilities before the end of the session for the discussion, if not the passing, of the Museum Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We consider the Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman refers to be a Bill of a public character, and we are more or less responsible for it in the way stated by my right hon. friend. But whether it would be possible for me to find time this session for the discussion of the Bill is a question which at the present moment I cannot answer.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: May I ask what will be the business for next Thursday and Friday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My expectation is that the Railways (Prevention of Accidents) Bill will be taken on Thursday, and the Home Office Vote on Friday.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: Is it certain we shall get the Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories and Workshops, on which the discussion of the Home Office Vote turns, by Friday night? If we do not, will the right hon. Gentleman undertake not to proceed with that Vote?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will make inquiry. If it is impossible to have the Vote circulated, I will not press the Vote under conditions which would render the discussion of it more or less nugatory.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: We have been told the Report is in the hands of the printers. Perhaps we can have it in a day or two. I will put down a question for to-morrow.

MR. YERBURGH: Do the Government intend to proceed with the Money-lending Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think I have any statement to make upon that subject, but it will, perhaps, be more appropriately raised in the course of the debate which is about to be initiated on my motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to the Public Health (Ireland) Bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I now rise to move the resolution which stands in my name. I think it will, broadly speaking, fit in with the wishes of the House, and I am certain that it will fit in with its convenience. It is in accordance with precedent that it should be moved by me about this time; in fact, I think it has very frequently been moved before this date. I am aware that the motion will have the effect of depriving certain hon. Members of the opportunity they have obtained of discussing questions which interest them, and, possibly, other people also. That is an inevitable misfortune, but I think it is only due to the Government to say that, as far as I am aware, not a single Tuesday has been taken in the course of this session for advancing the ordinary Government programme of legislation. Tuesdays have been taken for the financial business of the year, but not for the purpose of advancing any single Bill which the Government have upon the Order Paper. In these circumstances, now that we have reached this stage of the session, I think it not unreasonable that the Government should ask the House to give further facilities for proceeding with their general programme. As this is not the time to make a statement with regard to any possible diminution of the size of that programme, I will content myself by moving the resolution of which I have given notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That for the remainder of the session Government business do have precedence on Tuesday and Wednesday (except on Wednesdays the 20th and 27th of June),

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not imagine that there will be much disposition to find fault with a motion of this kind being made at this period of the session, but I am very much surprised to find it unaccompanied by any statement whatever with regard to the prospects of legislation for the rest of the session. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes for a precedent, I would remind him that last year when he made a similar motion he announced what Bills would be proceeded with, and on previous occasions, when such a motion has been made, that explanation has always taken place. I may speak quite frankly. There are certain Bills as to the future fate of which there is considerable doubt in everyone's mind—no doubt as to how the House will regard them, but doubt as to the serious intentions of the Government to proceed with them. I should have thought that this was the very occasion on which the House might expect and, in fact, is entitled to have some information with regard to the fate of those Bills. I do not know when the right hon. Gentleman proposes that there should be a statement made which will enable the House to discuss this part of the Government's proceedings, and I think that most Members will share my astonishment at the course the right hon. Gentleman has taken. As to whether the Government should now take the whole time of the House with certain exceptions, there is, I think, little to be said on that point. I think the right hon. Gentleman stretched his demand upon the assent of the House a little too far when he said the Government had not previously in the session taken Tuesdays for legislative business. He admitted that they had taken them for financial purposes, and I would point out that in so doing they freed other Government days for legislative work, and the effect upon the rights of private Members was exactly the same as if the Tuesdays had been used to advance Government Bills. Now, I have an appeal to make to the right hon. Gentleman. He proposes to give us two Wednesdays for the further discussion of certain more fortunate Private Members' Bills. In the past, three Wednesdays have usually been set apart for that purpose, and I do not know why he is so niggardly with his allowance on the present occasion. I think, after looking into the matter, that it requires a little more consideration than seems to have been given to it. We have now an experience extending over a year or two of this proposal, and I can only say that it has worked in a haphazard way. I do not know what is the rule as to the seniority of a Bill. A Bill may be read a second time unanimously, and it may have entered on the Committee stage, but another Bill, referred to a Standing Committee, may take precedence of it. That is an irregular form of arrangement which I think hardly carries out the intention of the rules of the House. There is a Bill for prohibiting the sale of drink to children under sixteen years of age. This is a Bill which has created an immense amount of feeling throughout the country. I am—as no doubt is the right hon. Gentleman—in receipt of communications from all quarters with regard to this Bill. The representations have come to me not from those interested in party questions, not from fanatics, not from those having strong opinions on the licensing question, but from churches, Sunday schools, and other recognised institutions in their thousands, showing that there is an immense amount of feeling on both sides quite apart from party division. One memorial signed by some thousands of Sunday-school teachers and managers has come from Liverpool. The Bill received the unanimous assent of the House. ["No, no!"] Well, there was no division on it. But now it is in the third place, not in the first, because it was not referred, at the request of the Home Secretary, to the Standing Committee. I believe that if my hon. friend had resisted the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman the feeling of the House was such that his motion would have been carried and the Bill would have retained its precedence. Other Bills I could mention have met a similar unfortunate fate. I object to this happy-go-lucky system and its effect on the Bills before the House. The feeling in the country is very strong on this question, and I make an appeal to the Government to give some special opportunity for the further progress of this Bill. My object in rising was to point out that the rule works unequally, unfairly, and deserves the attention of the right hon.

Gentleman, who has done so much, while Leader of the House, to increase the efficiency of our manner of conducting business.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman in the ex parte statement he has made on behalf of a Bill set down for consideration on a future day. But I must enter my protest against the statement that the Bill was unanimously accepted by the House. What occurred was that it came on unexpectedly in the absence of most of the opponents of the Bill, and so far from being unopposed the right hon. Gentleman must be well aware that it will be strongly resisted in its future stages in this House, and I must say that it would have been more candid if he had recognised these facts in his references to the subject. But without following the right hon. Gentleman into the somewhat irregular channel into which he has attempted to draw the House I should like to put before my right hon. friend reasons why he certainly should not give more Wednesdays up for the purpose suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. If he requires time he should take it impartially from Members who are interested in motions and from those who are interested in Bills. In regard to the present motion we are asked to give up for the rest of the session any power we possess of raising any question, be it important, urgent, or otherwise, in this House. I shall be told perhaps that Standing Order No. 17 makes provision for raising questions of urgency. My reply is that, for reasons with which the House is familiar, that has ceased to be the safeguard which it was intended by its promoters to be. I will not, however, go into this question in detail. I notice that my right hon. friend approaches this subject of Motions for Adjournment on matters of urgency in a somewhat changeful mood; in fact, his attitude is somewhat suggestive of that which dominated Pharaoh during the intervals between the Egyptian plagues. At times he is very sympathetic, but at other periods, when the immediate peril has subsided, he relapses into hardness of heart. I could go on to remind my right hon. friend of other examples, but perhaps I had better not do so, lest I give rise to misapprehension. I would refer, however, to an allegorical personage—and I do not suggest for one moment that my right hon. friend reminds me of that personage in either shape or form, for on the contrary I regard him as the embodiment of his absolute antithesis—hence I may allude to the allegorical personage who, when sick, was alleged to have formed resolves in the direction of becoming a monk, or, as some versions have it, a saint, but whose aspirations towards canonisation, and yearnings for the cloister, evaporated on convalescence. At any rate, the right hon. Gentleman will admit that, by the interpretation which has been put upon our procedure, we may be precluded by a Member absent in South Africa, or even by a Member here, from raising any of those important questions which it was intended we should be enabled to raise under the Standing Order I have referred to. I do not wish, however, to offer any objection to the taking of private Members' time for the bona fide purpose of winding up the session, which, I take it, is the real object of the right hon. Gentleman's motion, but I do wish to point out that he is placing us in an unprecedented position with regard to our powers of raising questions of urgency, and I certainly hope he will give this matter consideration at the earliest opportunity.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: We are called upon to-day to sacrifice a large number of Private Members' Bills to which there is practically no opposition at all, and we are called upon to do this without knowing what is to be the probable fate of at least four Government Bills that are likely to take a great deal of time, and which will in all probability be dropped. We are, therefore, asked to decide this question in the dark. We cannot possibly say whether two or three Wednesdays will or will not be required for Private Members' Bills until we compare the Government Bills which are likely to be dropped, and the Private Members' Bills which will be killed if this motion is carried. This matter is one of some importance on account of its bearing on the procedure of the Standing Committees of this House. The Standing Committees this year have been very hard-worked indeed; they have had, and still have a larger number of Bills under their consideration than has ever been the case before. A considerable number of those Bills are measures to which there is either little or no opposition at all, so far as one can judge by the Second Reading debates and the discussions before the Standing Committees themselves. The Government Bills to which I have especially referred are four in number. I do not speak of Scotch or Irish Bills with which I am not acquainted, but speaking of English Bills there are four which, from what we have heard and seen for ourselves, seem likely to be dropped. It is probable the Companies Bill will be dropped. If the Government had intended to persevere with that useful measure, in which so great a number of Members are interested, I imagine they would have made some progress with it before this time. The fact that it has been put in a fair position among the Orders of the Day on almost every Monday, but never in a very high position, leads those of us who have some experience of these matters to think it is not intended by the Government to pass that Bill this session. There is also the Factory and Workshops Bill, which has occupied a position just below the Companies Bill all through the session, and with which also there has been no serious attempt to go forward. Then there is the Money-lending Bill, which was the subject of inquiry recently, and there is another Bill, also of importance, and one which is rather actively opposed—namely, the Dogs Regulation Bill. I imagine there are few Members under the impression that the Government will pass these Bills through the House, and yet the fact that they will not tell us what they mean to do in regard to any of them keeps us in the dark in this debate. On the other hand, the Private Members' Bills of this year are very numerous and important—I mean not the ordinary Private Members' Bills which are brought in every year, but Bills which have either passed through or are still before the Standing Committee or have been read a second time unanimously or by overwhelming majorities. I may add one other Bill, in which, throughout the Empire, great interest is taken, and which stands in a position somewhat similar to those I have mentioned—a Bill which is passing not through this House, but through the House of Lords: I mean the Colonial Marriages Bill. This is a measure which has in its favour an overwhelming majority in both Houses of Parliament, but to which, if this motion is carried, we shall not be able to afford any time. But, putting aside the Colonial Marriages Bill, there are a singularly large number of Bills this year which, although in the hands of private Members, have passed through, or are before a Standing Committee. If this motion is carried, in what an extraordinary position the two Standing Committees will remain during the rest of the session! They will have Bills coming before them on four days a week, and Members will be asked to attend at great inconvenience, to make great sacrifices, to give up all other engagements, and to sit in this House for twelve hours a day with the certainty that their work will be entirely useless, knowing that those Bills with which they are called upon to deal, if a single Member opposes them, will have no chance whatever of passing into law. There is the Workmen's Compensation Bill which has passed through Standing Committee, and it stands first for next Wednesday. There can be no doubt that that Bill will pass. It passed its Second Reading unanimously, and it passed through Standing Committee after a great deal of discussion, but without any opposition. Though very short, it is an extremely complicated and difficult Bill, which undoubtedly deserves and will receive careful consideration at the hands of the House. There is every probability that on Report next Wednesday, and on Third Reading the Wednesday after, the measure will occupy the whole of the sitting. That, therefore, is the one Bill to which this proposal gives a chance, all other Bills, as it appears to me, having no chance whatever if this motion is carried. Among the other Bills there is the Merchant Shipping Bill, in the hands of hon. Members opposite, which has passed its Second Reading and the Standing Committee, and in which a great number of shipping Members are interested. There is the Borough Funds Bill, a Bill of the utmost importance, in regard to which there is a general agreement, and which, on pledges being given that certain modifications should be made in Committee, passed its Second Reading without opposition. Those modifications were made, and the Bill passed very rapidly through Standing Committee, but still, if a single Member of this House opposes that Bill after this motion is carried, it will be lost. I say a single

Member of this House, because it is unfortunately the fact—and a fact which I think is a scandal in relation to the performances of this House—that during the last four or five years, if two Members have actively opposed any Private Member's Bill, that Bill has not been carried. I believe that during the last two or three years no Private Member's Bill has been carried which was actively opposed at all its stages by even a single Member. The Bill of last year as to children under thirteen years of age, although very actively opposed on the Second Reading and Committee stages, was not really opposed on Report or Third Reading. In addition to the Bills to which I have referred, there is a Scotch Bill coming before the Standing Committee—namely, the Town Councils (Scotland) Bill, a very important Bill, and one which will, no doubt, pass through the Standing Committee, but with the certainty that if one Member actively opposes the Bill all the labours of the Standing Committee with regard to it will be lost. Then there is the County and Borough Franchise (London) Bill, a Bill to which a great number of Members attach very high importance. That Bill is down to come before the Standing Committee. There is a general agreement as to what it should contain, but it is a Bill of a kind which is almost certain after it has passed through the Standing Committee to meet with opposition from one or two Members of this House if it is known that such opposition is sufficient to kill the Bill. That is a case of a Bill which, although supported by an overwhelming majority of the Members of this House, will undoubtedly be killed if this motion is carried. Then there is the Sunday Closing (Wales) Bill, which also has still to go before the Standing Committee, and which also no doubt will be killed by this proposal. I venture to suggest that there never has been an occasion when the issue presented to the House by this seemingly unimportant motion was more important on its bearing on the forms of the House than on this occasion. There has never been an occasion when the practical difference in modern times between what was meant by the resolution as to business after Whitsuntide and the actual fact was more startling than it is to-day. The Leader of the Opposition referred to the manner in which Bill-are grouped after Whitsuntide. That proposal was one carried by Sir Stafford Northcote's Committee, by which, on Wednesdays after Whitsuntide, Bills were placed in order according to the amount of progress they had made. When that proposal was carried the idea was that it should apply to the remaining Wednesdays of the session until we reached August, and that was the practice of the House. But when the operation of the Standing Order is narrowed to two Wednesdays only it becomes ridiculous, and as every Member of the House knows, it stands now in a ludicrous position. We should not be in order on this or any similar occasion when we are discussing a motion to take time—although our minds cannot be free from the consideration of the matter—in dealing with proposals to change the forms of the House. I am one of those who think the House, or large bodies of Members of the House, should have the power of deciding on the order in which Bills should be presented to the House. We should not, however, be in order in discussing that or any such proposal on this occasion, but the scandal of the present system—the certainty that all these Bills, upon which so much labour has been bestowed, which have occupied and still will occupy the attention of the Standing Committees (if under these circumstances quorums can be obtained to consider the Bills) will be sacrificed by this resolution for a Government programme which is not announced to us—seems to me to be greater on this occasion than ever at any time before.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I think many Members share the feeling of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean, as to the novelty of the position taken up by my right hon. friend the Leader of the House on this occasion. On all former occasions, as far as I can remember, when it was proposed to absorb additional time after Whitsuntide, it has been recognised that something was being taken from private Members, and the Leader of the House has given assurances that the time so taken should be spent on certain definite objects. It was a kind of "give and take" arrangement, from which I think my right hon. friend has on this occasion for the first time departed. It is a rather remarkable and, I think, unfortunate circumstance. It is especially unfortunate in view of the fact, put before us by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean, that a large part of the Government programme will probably not be persevered with. There is no serious suggestion that some of the Bills will be carried into law, while, on the other hand, there are a great number of Private Members' Bills, in some of which the Government themselves have a kind of interest, which will be entirely destroyed or shorn of all chance of success by the proposal now before us. For example, there is the Bill which was made the subject of question and answer to-day—a Bill which was brought in under the charge of private Members but which, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, was instigated by the Government themselves. That Bill may or may not command the assent of the House, but it is a measure which ought to be allowed to come under consideration. My object in rising to-day, however, is not merely to repeat what has been said so admirably by the right hon. Gentleman, but to point out that there is really no reason this year for the restriction of the exceptional Wednesdays to the first two after Whitsuntide. When the rule was first adopted giving after Whitsuntide precedence to Bills in the order of the amount of progress they had made, the right of private Members to Wednesdays was not interfered with until the end of July. We used to have all the Wednesdays after Whitsuntide to the end of July, and the Orders were absorbed for Government business. That is quite defensible when there is a large amount of public business in which we are all interested impeded in its progress. But that does not apply this year, and we are not justified in adopting the new plan of restricting the Wednesdays allowed to private Members to the two mentioned in the resolution, when the motive for the restriction is not present. Besides the Bills which have been proceeded with in this House, there is one which has commanded a majority in another place, and which would be sure to pass this House, as we have not even a Bench of Bishops to give a majority in opposition to it—I mean the Bill with respect to colonial marriages. That Bill will be shut out altogether in the event of this resolution being adopted. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the fact that it will be within the power of any one Member to prevent further progress being made with any of these Bills. But as soon as the Government absorb every evening and every afternoon, pressure is naturally and rightly put on the Government to adopt the further rule of moving the adjournment of the House as soon as Government business is disposed of. On these grounds I think there is a very strong case for reconsidering the proposition made by my right hon. friend. I think the House would be well advised in excluding altogether Wednesday from the purview of the resolution before the House. I do press very strongly upon the right hon. Gentleman that Wednesday should be excluded altogether from this motion.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: I think the House has some ground to complain that the right hon. Gentleman has not given any reason except a purely formal one for the motion which he asks the House to accept. He has asked permission to take Wednesday up to the end of the session without telling the House what he proposes to do with the Wednesdays which will be absorbed. Hitherto a proposition of this kind has never been made only upon the ground that there was a mass of Government business to be got through, but on this occasion the right hon. Gentleman has not followed even his own precedent. On the 19th of June last year* the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House made a similar proposal, and moved a resolution in the same words, and in his speech in support of the motion he said—

"I do not propose to give an exact programme of what we hope to pass, because that would be impossible; nor has anyone in my position, at this period of the session, ever attempted such a task."

Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to read a list of the various measures before the House, the various stages they had reached, and what he thought would happen to them. What is still more important, the right hon. Gentleman gave the House a pledge with reference to the introduction of any future measures to the effect that no Bills of a controversial character would be introduced. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"I do not, of course, say that all these measures will, as a matter of fact, pass into law before we separate, but I hope very substantial progress will be made with the list which I have just read to the House."

What the right hon. Gentleman did then was to give the House an idea of what was passing in the mind of the Government, so that the House was put in possession of what the Government proposed to do in regard to the business for the rest of the session. I agree with what has been said by my right hon. friend as to the very important Private Members' Bills which have not yet been disposed of, and about which there can be very little doubt that they will not be disposed of this session. But at any rate we have a right to know what the Government intend to do with their own Bills, what they intend to proceed with, and what they do not intend to proceed with. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean has alluded to two Bills which the right hon. Gentleman referred to in his speech last year. For example, there is the Money-lending Bill. I think the House has a right to know whether the Government are in earnest about that Bill or not. There is another Bill which has not been mentioned, with reference to which I must say that if it is not proceeded with it will amount almost to a public scandal—I refer to the Companies Bill. That is a serious scandal in commercial life which ought to be dealt with at once. It is not in an incomplete state. That measure has been under the consideration of the House of Lords and the Judges and others for three or four years, and they have sent the Bill down to this House. I do not mean to say that the measure is perfect, but upon many points connected with it there is a general assent among the commercial and legal public. If the Government would put their foot down they can carry that Bill through the House during the remainder of this session. [Mr. GIBSON BOWLES dissented.] My hon. friend the Member for King's Lynn shakes his head, but I think even his opposition might be overcome by a strong Government. Then there is the Factories Bill, and there is also another measure which I think ought not to be put on one side this session under the peculiar circumstances of the case—I mean the Colonial Marriages Bill. That is a Bill which the Imperial Parliament ought to deal with. It has been passed by an enormous majority this session on the Second Reading in the House of

* See The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxii, page 1502.

Lords, and it is a Bill upon which there can be no shadow of a doubt that there is an enormous majority in this House in favour of it. I think also that the time has arrived when the right hon. Gentleman should make a stand with regard to the enormous power which insignificant majorities in this House have of preventing legislation which the majority of this House desire to pass. I think the time has arrived for a thorough reconsideration of a great many of the rules of the House, for many of them are not adapted to meet our needs. An enormous amount of the time of the House of Commons is deliberately wasted session after session, and especially the references to Grand Committees requires reconsideration. I consider the mode of reference to Grand Committees is a departure from the principles which Mr. Gladstone laid down when he made the motion for these Grand Committees, because the House has now thrown upon them a larger amount of business which it has become impossible for them to pass through during the remainder of the session after Whitsuntide. I think all these questions—and especially the 17th Standing Order to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet has alluded—require to be dealt with, for this Standing Order places it within the power of one hon. Member to prevent the House of Commons from discussing most important questions affecting the Empire. I think all these things ought to be sufficient to convince the right hon. Gentleman that the time has arrived to reconsider some of our rules of debate. Upon the present occasion the right hon. Gentleman has not told us for what purpose he is asking the House of Commons to adopt this course. I think the House ought to know to what purpose he intends devoting the time which he is asking the House of Commons to concede.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As several hon. Members of great importance in this House, occupying leading positions with regard to public business, have risen in their places and attacked me on the present occasion, I think I ought not to defer my reply to the strictures they have passed. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has laid special emphasis upon one of those criticisms. The right hon. Gentleman has repeated with more elaboration the charge made by the Leader of the Opposition that the Government have failed on this occasion to explain the need for further facilities for the conduct of Government business. The right hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension. I have in this respect carefully followed precedent. The right hon. Gentleman quoted, to my great surprise, a speech of mine made last year on the 19th of June, at a similar period of the session, when I asked for similar powers. If the right hon. Gentleman had read that speech carefully he would see that I deliberately declined, either in that speech or in the course of the debate which followed, to in any sense indicate what Bills the Government were determined to pass or what Bills they felt bound to sacrifice. There was a period of the session which was well known to hon. Members—the Parliamentary “massacre of innocents”—on which that statement was made to the House; but on the present occasion it was never made, and I certainly did not make the statement when I asked last year for the privilege I now ask the House to give. It would be impossible at this period of the session to make such a statement; it would be in the highest degree inexpedient for the Government to attempt to foretell the various measures which should be proceeded with, a power which even the most experienced Members certainly could not lay claim to. How is it possible to foretell the length of time the various motions on the Order Paper will take? It is not possible, and until the Government have some further information on that point, in my judgment it will be in the highest degree inexpedient to give the right hon. Gentleman the information he desires. I pass from the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton to the criticisms made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean and my right hon. friend the Member for Bodmin, who preceded him. As I understand them, they say that the number of Private Members’ Bills is so great, and they are of such great importance, that the Government ought to sacrifice their own time and allow these Wednesdays to remain in the possession of private Members. I entirely dissent from that view. I think that it would be a departure from precedent, and it would not conduce to the general convenience of the House. I also must enter, not for the first time, my protest against the view that Private Members' Bills stand on an equality of treatment with Government Bills. They do not stand on the same equality of treatment. Time after time the hon. Member for East Mayo has protested against Government Bills being brought in under what is known as the Ten Minutes Rule. A private Member may bring in a Bill abolishing the House of Lords, or the Monarchy, not under the Ten Minutes rule, but without a word being said. No Government has ever attempted to bring in a Bill making a really important constitutional change without observing the full forms of the House, involving a consequent expenditure of time. It has now become practically a fixed rule and tradition of this House, although it is not embodied in the Standing Orders, that whatever a Private Member's Bill may be it may be brought in at twelve o'clock on Wednesday, and then that four and a half hours of discussion is enough to decide the principle of that measure. I am not aware that either you, Sir, or your predecessor in the Chair has ever refused the closure for a Bill brought in under these conditions. What Government Bill of any importance has ever been allowed to pass this House after a discussion of four and a half hours? Such a state of things would not be tolerated. We should be told that it was a gross invasion of Parliamentary privileges if the Government asked for, and Mr. Speaker granted, the closure on any first-class measure, or even on any second-class measure of importance after four and a half hours discussion. Why has this House tolerated these peculiar privileges to Private Members' Bills on their earlier stages? Is it because the House attaches greater value to the legislative efforts of private Members than to the legislative efforts of the Government? It has never committed itself to any doctrine so absurd as that. The real truth is, although it is not embodied in the forms of the House, that the great majority of our Wednesday afternoon Bills are not discussed at all in a manner comparable with the discussion on Government measures. The discussions are more in the nature of decisions of the House on certain abstract propositions conceived to be embodied in the Bills before them. Every hon. Member knows that what I say is correct. An hon. Member will get up and say, "This is an absurd Bill; it contains this or that impossible provision, but yet it embodies some principles I approve of, and therefore I will either abstain or will vote for the Second Reading." That is not the way Government Bills are treated or ought to be treated. If we are going to give all these privileges to private Members' Bills in their earlier stages, and then in addition extend to them all the privileges of Government Bills in their later stages, I think our legislative system will fall into chaos, and the legislative business of this House will not show itself to the best advantage. As regards the particular measures which have been mentioned I have another answer. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said: "Here is the Companies Bill, which is a most important Bill; a Bill to cut out the gangrene which is eating into our commercial system, and it will be a public scandal if it does not pass this year." But what chance has it of passing unless we get the time?

SIR HENRY FOWLER: Will you pass it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Oh, yes; we want to pass all our Bills. For the right hon. Gentleman to say in one breath that this motion ought to be opposed because it takes away the time of private Members, and then to blame the Government for not passing Bills, seems to me a position so inconsistent that I hardly believe the right hon. Gentleman appreciates the argument he is using. Allusion has been made to my speech last year on a similar occasion. It is quite true that that speech was longer than the speech with which I introduced the motion on this occasion, but we had to deal with several important controversial Bills, and the House was anxious to know what future legislation the Government contemplated. If the House desires the assurance, I can assure them that no controversial business, so far as I am aware, other than that already before the House or that has been introduced in another place—there are two Army Bills, I think, in another place—will be taken. I quite agree that it would be most unfair to ask the House to give us this time and then start a large number or even a single controversial Bill of which no notice had been given. We do not propose to take any such course. Hon. Gentlemen will find in the Order Paper which was issued this morning a full account of all the controversial business, or business which may be described as controversial or important, which the Government will attempt to pass. I am told that the Agricultural Holdings Bill and the Sea Fisheries Bill are not on the Paper, but they are included in that statement. I quite recognise that hon. Gentlemen have a right to the pledge I have just given. I do not, of course, promise that no Departmental Bills will be introduced, but even a Departmental Bill, if seriously opposed or opposed at all, will not be pressed on the notice of the House. I hope, under these circumstances and after the explanation I have given, the House will assent to the motion without a division.

MR. KEARLEY: The speeches which have been delivered so far on this motion deal with the question of Bills, but there is a great deal in what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet, that some amount of consideration should be given to motions. I am interested in a motion which I, at all events, and many people in the country feel to be one of urgency. I was very much surprised at the reply which was given to my modest request for an opportunity to discuss this motion. We might well expect that we should be given an opportunity of discussing first of all the Report of Lord Justice Collins's Committee on the administration of war funds; and, secondly, the proposals which the right hon. Gentleman tells us the Government have under consideration with reference to this question. I should be out of order in going into details, but I should like to press one important fact on the attention of the House. That is, that the flow of public benevolence in the way of providing pensions has practically come to an end, and there is no further expectation of any larger contributions being made by the public. That is perfectly obvious to anyone who has followed the amounts contributed day by day. On the other hand, the number of widows, as a result of the war, amounts to 2,000, and I am told they will continue to increase at the rate of 250 or 300 per month. I merely mention that to impress on the right hon. Gentleman that this question is urgent, and to press him again to give us an opportunity of discussing the Report of the Committee, and also the proposals of the Government with reference to it. The time is ripe for that discussion. This is no matter of an abstract resolution, but a matter in which the country is deeply interested. I intend to make my protest unless I get some satisfactory assurance. Meantime I will move the Amendment which I have handed in, which is to exclude to-morrow, which is the day on which the motion would come on.

MR. CHANNING: On a point of order, I wish to ask whether the Amendment of my hon. friend has priority over my Amendment, which is to leave out all words after Tuesday, so as to restrict the effect on the motion to Tuesdays.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must move to substitute "Tuesdays" for "Tuesday," and to leave out to the end of the line. That Amendment takes precedence of the other Amendment.

MR. CHANNING: In moving my Amendment, which seems to me to be the logical outcome of the unanswered and unanswerable speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin, I should like to make one remark as to the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury, which seemed to be as unsatisfactory as it was singular. The right hon. Gentleman deprecated abstract discussions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never did anything of the kind.

MR. CHANNING: I do not mean that the right hon. Gentleman in terms deprecated abstract discussions, but what he did deprecate was the giving a further time to private Members on the ground that Wednesdays were usually occupied with abstract discussions. But I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that Private Members' Bills which have obtained the assent of the House with unanimity or without division, and which represent the opinion of the majority of the House, and presumably of the country, cannot be regarded as matters of abstract discussion, but as the practical decisions of the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman wishes to withhold time from these Bills, and not to give further facilities for them, although it has been proved by the decisions of the House itself that they are not mere abstract questions, but questions of practical urgency. The right hon. Gentleman fell foul of my right hon. friend the Member for East Wolverhampton for challenging his policy in not making any statement whatever as to the use of the time which the Government propose to take. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman has already forgotten that the Companies Bill held the first place in the Queen's Speech in the present session, and that it has already passed the House of Lords. It is singular and unprecedented that at this period of the session such a Bill should be left in the lurch, and that the right hon. Gentleman is not ready to make any statement regarding a measure of such urgency and importance to the commercial interests of the country. The right hon. Gentleman is in this dilemma—that he has given no case for the Government proposals, and he refuses time for the proposals of private Members—an unprecedented number of which have unanimously passed their Second Reading, have been sent to Standing Committees, and have received the laborious consideration of many Members of this House. I venture to say that in a session like this—there might be some sessions in which he would undoubtedly be justified in making his present proposals—but in a session like this when the enormous number of measures referred to by the right hon. the Member for Forest of Dean are waiting for the final decision of the House, it would be a monstrous scandal if the House of Commons did not allow further time for carrying to completion Bills which have received general assent.

MR. SOUTTAR (Dumfriesshire): I beg to second the Amendment, and to make an appeal to the Leader of the House, who perhaps knows that I had the opportunity of bringing in a Bill on the 9th March which passed its Second Reading. It has been said by the right hon. Gentleman below the gangway that that was an accident; but I do not understand the meaning of the word "accident" as applied to a Bill in that way.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: It came on at an unexpected hour.

MR. SOUTTAR: I can only say that it was on the Order Paper of this House eight times before it came on, and that if it came on unexpectedly it did so in a very crowded House, and all the benches were full and hon. Members were standing below the Bar. But I do not desire to base my appeal on that ground at all. I believe that the heart of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House is in the right place with regard to this measure, and I should be most grateful, and I am sure many others on his own side of the House would be likewise grateful, if he could give our case some little kindly consideration. I know perfectly well that the gift of another Wednesday would be valueless unless he gave the case his personal consideration; but I am certain that one word from him would be golden, and this measure might then easily pass into law. I may say one thing in regard to the Bill which may not have reached the right hon. Gentleman's notice. The fact that I am connected with this particular measure is an accident. Five Bills drafted in almost exactly the same phraseology and having precisely the same effect were introduced this session—three of which were promoted from the right hon. Gentleman's own side of the House—one by the hon. Member for one of the Divisions of Glasgow, one by the hon. Member for Norwood, and the third, begun in another place, was initiated by one of the Belfast Members. It will be seen that there is a wonderful unanimity of feeling in regard to this particular measure, for each one of these five Bills had five separate sets of backers, and in two cases these backers were almost entirely members of the Conservative party. I do trust the right hon. Gentleman will be kindly in this matter and do something to help forward a measure in connection with which much good will be done in the country. If he will only help it he will gain great popularity in the country and strengthen the position of his own supporters.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 3, to leave out the word 'Tuesday,' and insert the word 'Tuesdays,' instead thereof."—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Tuesday' stand part of the Question."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: The hon. Members the mover and the seconder of the Amendment have with great ability shown the strongest part of the Government case. If there is a day that can be spared to the Government it is Wednesday—far before Tuesday. The hon. Member for Dumfriesshire has given a very apposite illustration of the mischief that can be done on Wednesdays. He says that the Second Reading of the Bill in which he is interested was not an accident, and then he proceeded to prove that it was an accident by saying that it had been eight times on the Order Paper before. Surely if it came on the ninth time that may be considered accidental. The hon. Member for East Northamptonshire says that these Bills represent the unanimous vote of the House, or that the vast majority of the House pass them. It is perfectly well known that never on Wednesdays is there a vast majority of the House present, but only a small minority who occupy the afternoon in bringing forward motions or Bills which cannot come on on any other day. I maintain that the vast majority of the Bills read a second time on Wednesdays are so read because the House knows perfectly well that they will never be heard of again. I have not the legislative appetite of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin, who seems to think that we should spend all our time in passing Acts of Parliament. Most, or at least many, of these Acts do a great deal more harm than good. As to the Grand Committees which he held up to our approbation—the attempt to delegate the business of this House to a portion of its Members has been a complete failure. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment dwelt upon the fact that the First Lord of the Treasury in his first speech did not specify the Bills which the Government intended to go on with; but the right hon. Gentleman has remedied that in his second speech, for he has now told us that what is on the Blue Paper is what the Government seriously propose to go on with, and that they will deal with nothing else that is contentious. [Mr. BALFOUR dissented.] I understood the First Lord to say that there were certain Bills on the Blue Paper which were uncontentious, but if there were any contentious Bills they would not be pressed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope I have not been so obscure in my statement. What I said was that the Blue Paper contained the full Government programme with the exception of one or two Bills which were before the Committees, and one or two Military Bills which are in the House of Lords, and that outside that no new measures of a contentious character would be proceeded with.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Whatescaped me was the proviso in regard to Bills before Committees. The Bill I was thinking of, the Undersized Fish Bill, is before a Committee, and that is a very contentious measure and will be very strongly opposed when it again comes before the House. Undoubtedly at this time of the year the Government have a very considerable case for taking—I won't say the Tuesdays, but the Wednesdays. I therefore shall be able with a most unseared conscience to vote against the Amendment now made. Of all the days of the week the most mischievous is Wednesday, and the least useful. I think when I come to the Tuesdays which this Amendment proposes to give to the Government—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is out of order in referring to Tuesday under this Amendment.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Then, when the debate on the main question is resumed I am afraid I shall have to trouble you with further remarks. All I say in regard to Wednesdays is, that I shall hail with pleasure their disappearance from the private Members' programme. I am a member of a very useful Committee—the Public Accounts Committee—which meets on Wednesday, and my attention will not be diverted from the important work on that Committee in order to come downstairs to vote against private Members' Bills on that day. Before I sit down I wish to dissociate myself from the remark made by the right hon. Member for the Isle of Thanet when he throws doubt on the existence of a personage I was always taught to believe in. If that historical personage and his dwelling place are to be regarded as wholly allegorical, then he has deprived many pious friends of their greatest hopes—for other people.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS : I cannot refrain from uttering my protest against a resolution the effect of which is to cut off any chance of a Bill in which I am interested becoming law—the Bill, namely, to amend the Welsh Sunday Closing Act of 1881. That Bill passed without a division its Second Reading on 9th May. It is not an abstract question; nor is it a useless Bill. It is a Bill which is founded upon the deliberate judgment of two Commissions, and which I venture to say has a body of support in Wales which few measures introduced in this House have had in previous years. I do not intend to take up the time of the House on the present occasion in elaborating my protest, but it is impossible for me, knowing as I do, the great interest that the people of Wales take in this Bill; knowing how easily it might be passed, seeing it is a simple, short, and noncontentious Bill—to refrain from expressing my great regret that the Leader of the House, in answering my question, should have said that there is very little chance of giving any favourable consideration to the Bill during the present session. I admit that the root of the difficulty we are in in regard to these Bills is not the present motion, but the rules of the House; and I hope the day is not far distant when some arrangement will be made which will enable a Bill of this kind, with so much support, to be passed into law, and thus carry out the predominant sentiment of the people of Wales.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN :

The right hon. Gentleman has put a considerable strain upon the loyalty of those who are his supporters, including myself. In my earlier remarks I began by saying that this was not an unreasonable motion to be made at this time of the year; but I did expect that the right hon. Gentleman would give us some reason for the support which he wants us to give him. We wish to know what he means to do with the time when he gets it; and I think he has departed from the usual practice on this matter. But now it is proposed that Wednesdays should be left and that Tuesdays should be taken. This is a sort of discussion in which every man is most anxious to sacrifice his neighbour. If I am interested in a Tuesday, then I say that the Wednesday should go; if I am interested in the Wednesday, then it is the other way. I think we should be impartial in regard to this matter. Notwithstanding the unfortunate effect of our present rules upon certain Bills—one of which I dwelt upon as being a very good case—I do not think that on that ground we are entitled to jump to the opposite extreme, and leave the whole of the Wednesdays alive for the private Members to the end of the session. It may be a very right thing, possibly, that the Wednesdays should belong to private Members from one end of the session to the other; but let it be done in a deliberate way, and regard paid to the rules of the House in a wider spirit, not simply because there happens to be a great number of useful private Members' Bills at the present moment on the stocks. The development of private Members' Bills, no doubt, has been great. I do not know that it was originally intended, when Standing Committees were set up, that private Members' Bills were to be sent up to them at all; but they do go to them, and the consequence is that we have great labour expended on these Bills at this choking time of the session, and then they are deprived of all sort of useful life. I deplore that, but at the same time I think it is the fault of our rules, which ought to be remodelled with a view to prevent the recurrence of such circumstances. I hardly see my way to support the Amendment, which would take the whole of the Wednesdays from the Government for the rest of the session and give them to private Members.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomeryshire) : I quite sympathise with what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. I think we should all of us wish to give the Government the Wednesdays at a somewhat more reasonable period than is proposed by the present motion. I am perfectly ready to leave it to the House to modify the Amendment, so that only a certain number of Wednesdays should be excepted, leaving it to the Government to propose later on to take the whole time of the House. Before I sit down I wish to add my strong protest against the blocking of the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill, in regard to which there is a very strong feeling in Wales. But there is another Bill of even greater importance—the Bill, namely, to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors to children under sixteen years of age. Only this morning I received from a board of guardians of which I am a member, and which stands very high indeed amongst the well-administered boards, a resolution to the following effect—

“The guardians of this board being of opinion that a large proportion of the pauperism and crime of this country is due to the excessive consumption of intoxicating drink—”

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is going beyond the limits of comment on the motion before the House.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN: I submitted myself to the House before I began to read. I have simply to say that I have a very strongly worded resolution from a board of guardians—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is out of order.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN: By way of apology, I wish to say that I am only desirous of emphasising the importance of the Bill which the Government are now intending to burke.

MR. COURTNEY: I understand that the Amendment is to except the Wednesdays from the present resolution. But I would point out that the present resolution, however amended, is one that can be amended again. Even if the Amendment were carried the Government can return at the end of the month, say that they want to get more time, and then take the Wednesdays. It seems to me that the Amendment would not accomplish what the hon. Gentleman desires.

MR. TRITTON (Lambeth, Norwood): I intend to vote for the Amendment, because I want some more time to be accorded in this House to the consideration of what I believe is one of the most important Bills before the House this session. The Bill I refer to has been mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, and he told us the sad and somewhat hard fate that had befallen it. It was the first Bill carried through to a Second Reading, and that without any opposition, and it was put down for the first Wednesday after Whitsuntide in the sure and certain hope, as far as anything can be made sure and certain in this House, that it would have the first place after the Whitsuntide recess. Hon. Members will see that there are now two other Bills of very considerable importance placed before it. The Bill to stop the sale of intoxicating liquors to children is the outcome of the Joint Reports of the Royal Commission, and it has received unanimous support throughout the country. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would say, if asked, that there had been more petitions sent up in favour of that Bill than any other this session. It has met with the approval of a very large number of benches of magistrates. No fewer than fifty-four had done what they could to dissuade publicans from selling intoxicating liquors to children.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is justified in calling attention to a Bill, but not in giving all the reasons which may be urged in support of it.

MR. TRITTON: I certainly will not trespass for a moment on your ruling, Mr. Speaker. If Her Majesty's Government cannot see their way to grant a Wednesday for the remaining stages of that Bill, I offer them an alternative course—let them take it up as a Government measure, and crown their many social achievements by passing a Bill which will be fraught with the greatest possible blessing to the young people of this country.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Mr. Channing and Mr.
 Souttar.

MR. E. J. C. MORTON (Devonport):
 I beg to insert after the word "on" the words "Tuesday, the 19th." I venture to express the hope, seeing that this is a matter of such extreme importance, of such enormous interest to the public, and of such real urgency, that the right hon.
 Gentleman will accede to the request made in this motion. Now that we are in sight of a triumphant conclusion to the war in South Africa, I believe there is absolutely no subject whatever that interests the people of this country to a tenth part of the extent that the subject matter of the resolution which will be cut out from the proceedings of to-morrow, unless my Amendment is carried, interests the people. I do not know whether hon.
 Members quite realise what the urgency of this question is and its importance.
 It is only a few days ago that a newspaper, which is generally supposed to share and to sympathise with the principles of the party opposite, had a headline, and the announcement made in it was "A Soldier's Reward: Wounded at Modder River, and sent to the Workhouse." I venture to think that, with evidence like that of what is actually taking place in the country now, a sense of disgrace and a sense of shame is felt by the vast majority of the citizens of this Empire. Surely that sense of shame must weigh a hundredfold upon those who have the honour and responsibility of a seat in this House. I venture to think that the responsibility must weigh a thousandfold with the members of Her Majesty's Government. I believe that the mass of the people of this country feel that the absence of care for the wounded soldiers of the war, and the absence of protection and care for the widows and orphans of those who have given their lives to the nation, is a matter that ought to be looked after by the nation. It is not a thing that ought to be left to local administration and the administration of the poor law.

*MR. SPEAKER pointed out that the hon. Member was discussing a question which was beyond the scope of the Amendment.

MR. E. J. C. MORTON: Of course I obey your ruling, but I submit to the right hon. Gentleman that there is urgency in this matter. It has been pointed out by my hon. friend when he rose previously to move the Amendment I am now moving that the supply from private charity has already ceased. The amount already received from private charity is altogether inadequate, and considering what I know to be the feeling of the country, almost in every part of it, upon this matter, and with regard to the urgency of it, I venture to beseech the Government to allow us to have one day to discuss it. It is a matter of most vital national importance, especially in view of the fact that our wounded soldiers are now being sent to the workhouse. We have had an instance within the last few days of the way the Government has neglected up to the present to state to the House or the country what provision they intend to make to deal with this vastly important matter.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 3, after the words 'except on,' to insert the words 'Tuesday the 19th and.'"— (Mr. Edward Morton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The speech of the hon. Member is one of the most uncalled for I have ever listened to. No announcement as to the intentions of the Government with respect to this question more satisfactory to the hon. Member than that which has already been made could be elicited by a hundred speeches such as that which he proposes to make.

Ordered, That for the remainder of the session Government business do have precedence on Tuesday and Wednesday (except on Wednesdays the 20th and 27th June), and that the provisions of Standing Order No. 56 be extended to all the days of the week.

NEW BILL.

CUSTOMS DUTIES (ISLE OF MAN).

Bill to amend the Law with respect to Customs Duties in the Isle of Man, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hanbury and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

CUSTOMS DUTIES (ISLE OF MAN) BILL.

"To amend the Law with respect to Customs Duties in the Isle of Man," presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 250.]

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) in the Chair.]

Clauses 1, 2, 3, and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 :—

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The Amendment which stands first in my name, as well as some other Amendments in my name, are all closely connected. They are all placed on the Paper in connection with the arrangement which, as I stated to the House, had been made with the delegates of the different colonies with regard to the question of appeal. The earlier Amendments are purely verbal, consequential on what is really the only substantial Amendment, that to Clause 74. But as, of course, if the Committee were disinclined to pass the Amendment to Clause 74, these earlier Amendments would be unnecessary, I think it would be convenient that I should take this opportunity of stating our position in the matter. I also think it would be convenient, if there is to be a discussion on the principle—which I rather hope may not be the case—that it should take place on this formal Amendment. I think the question is one of some difficulty and complexity, and, therefore, even at the risk of repetition, I will venture to remind the Committee of what has already passed. The Bill which was sent to us from Australia dealt with the question of appeal in rather a drastic fashion. It practically abolished the ancient appeal to the Privy Council in constitutional cases, except where the public interests of any part of Her Majesty's dominions were concerned. To their proposal the Government, acting as trustees for the Empire, took serious exception. We stated from the first that it would be quite impossible for us to assent to it. We explained that we held it to be our duty to maintain this right of appeal wherever any interests outside Australia were concerned. We stated however, at the same time, that where questions arose which were purely of Australian concern, whatever opinion we might ourselves entertain as to the wisdom of the proposals that were made by the Australian people, we should not think it our duty to interfere or to insist upon any Amendments. We were unable at that time to come to any agreement with the delegates who had been appointed by the five federating States. They were in a somewhat exceptional position, because they had at that time only received a special mandate to carry the Bill exactly in the form in which it was passed by the Australian people. They did not feel themselves competent, therefore, to discuss with us any form of amendment. Accordingly Her Majesty's Government introduced a Bill with our own Amendments. On our own responsibility we restored the right of appeal as it had previously existed. But after we had introduced the Bill in that form, and between the First and Second Readings, we had further communications with the delegates from Australia. Those communications, though not confined to the delegates of the eastern States, were chiefly with them, because the delegate from Queensland had already agreed to our proposal. It was the delegates from the four eastern States who still desired either that the original Bill should be passed in its original form or that some arrangement should be come to as to the Amendments we proposed. The result of those communications with the four delegates was that we came to an arrangement. I have observed that that arrangement is frequently spoken of as a compromise. I think that is altogether an inaccurate expression. As I understand it, a compromise is an amicable understanding between parties who have differed, according to which each party gives up something in order to secure unanimity. But in the present instance I should describe our understanding as an arrangement in which neither party gives up anything to which they attach importance, which I think is a more satisfactory state of things. We, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government at any rate, desired only that the right of appeal should be maintained in all cases in which other than Australian interests were concerned, and that was absolutely conceded to us by the four delegates concerned. They on their part, I will not say exclusively, but at all events mainly, desired that certain constitutional questions which might hereafter arise as to the limits inter se of the powers of the States and of the Federal Parliament should be finally decided by the High Court, and that also was secured to them by the agreement at which we arrived. Having arrived at that agreement, we had to communicate it to Queensland, and the Queensland delegate and his Government both objected to the arrangement, as they were prepared to go much further in the direction which indeed commended itself to Her Majesty's Government, although we did not think it our duty to force it on the Australian colonies. I wish the Committee to bear in mind the extraordinary difficulty of the negotiations in which I have been engaged. In the first place I have had to deal with five separate interests, not to speak of the interests of Western Australia and New Zealand, which, not being federating colonies, may be put, perhaps, in the second rank as regards this question. I have had to deal with five separate interests represented with five different colonies. The first difficulty was to ascertain the opinion of those five separate colonies. How was I to ascertain it? I was blamed, rather roughly I think, by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition for, as he said, going behind the delegates in this matter. I am glad to think that they, at any rate, did not take offence at anything which I did; and I think that what has happened since has fully justified my attempt to ascertain from other respectable and influential sources the opinion of the Australian people as well as the opinions of the delegates and the Governments. But if I were to accept the opinions of the delegates as representative of the five Australian colonies, I am met with this difficulty—that the Australian delegates themselves agree in stating that they had no credentials for such a purpose; that they came here with a limited mandate. If, however, I try to get the opinions of the Governments who appointed them I am met with this difficulty—that those Governments, for whatever reasons I am totally unable to divine, have refrained from first to last from giving me any official indication of their opinions. Up to the present day I am still without any official communication whatever in regard to the various proposals which have been under consideration. I say, then, that the position has been one necessarily of some difficulty. The agreement to which I have referred removed all difficulty so far as the Imperial Government was concerned. We have got by that agreement everything that we desire. There remains the necessity, if possible, of satisfying in any final settlement the whole of the five colonies concerned, and in regard to that our position is really a Ministerial one. We have only to ascertain what the wishes of the Australian colonies are, and when we have ascertained them we have to carry them out. To us it is really of no consequence, so far as those Imperial interests go with which we were chiefly concerned, what the decision of the colonies may be. At the time I last addressed the House the position was this. Four colonies out of the five, by the mouths of their delegates, had approved of the agreement at which we had arrived. Therefore I placed on the Paper Amendments to carry out the decision which, although not unanimous, was at all events the decision of the majority of those concerned. Since then, through the usual channels of information—not by virtue of any official communication from any of the Governments concerned—I have learned that the arrangement to which we came is objected to on two grounds. In the first place, the colonies, perhaps with the exception of South Australia—and when I speak of the colonies I am speaking of the Governments of the colonies—appeared to consider that it would limit the right of appeal from the State Courts more than was done by the original Bill. It appears that there is some difficulty in ascertaining what would have been the exact effect of the original Bill. There is some difference of opinion amongst legal authorities in regard to this matter. Some assert that under the original Bill it would have been open to litigants, even where constitutional questions involving the powers of the States were concerned, at their option either to appeal to the Privy Council or to the High Court. Other authorities, on the contrary, say that in regard to those constitutional questions the appeal would only lie to the High Court, and this would be final. I do not pretend to settle that matter. I only say it is not as clear to me as it might be that the original Bill did allow of such an appeal. But at all events, it is clear to me that the general opinion in Australia at the present time is in favour of such an appeal—is in favour, that is to say, of a possible appeal to the Privy Council in cases which arise in the first instance in the State Courts. The second objection taken was that we had provided no appeal should lie from the High Court in such cases, unless the consent of the Governments of the two States or of the State and the Federal Government respectively concerned had been obtained to such an appeal. That appeal would have been by the leave of the Governments concerned who were interested in the settlement of the constitutional question. A serious objection has been taken to that by very distinguished legal authorities in the colonies, and it appears to be supported by the Governments, that it was introducing the executive into judicial questions. That would be a most unfortunate result. As soon as these objections were clearly stated Her Majesty's Government endeavoured to see whether some other changes might not be made which would, as we hoped, secure unanimity, including Queensland as well as the other four colonies, and would satisfy the particular objections that had been taken. We were assisted in our inquiries by the opinion that came to us from Chief Justice Griffiths, in which he suggested certain amendments of the proposed agreement to carry out these objects, and I am glad to say that we have now again, after communication this time with all the five delegates, arrived at a further proposal which does, at any rate, absolutely meet the two objections to which I have referred, and I am not aware of any other objections that have been taken. We propose in the new form of the clause which appears on the White Paper to-day, and which I shall propose at a later stage, that the right of appeal shall be restricted only in a single case—only in the case of a constitutional question arising as to the powers inter se between the States or the States and the Federal Government, and arising in the High Court. We strike out altogether all reference to the State Courts, leaving the state of the law on the question of appeal exactly where it was before, and we deal only with exceptional cases arising in the High Court. If I may express in arithmetical terms my own idea of what has happened it is this. Whereas in the original Bill as it was presented to us by the Australians in nine cases out of ten the right of appeal to the Queen in Council would have been restricted, and whereas by an agreement which we came to before the Second Reading, and before the delegates of the eastern States were heard, that right of appeal would have been restricted in perhaps five cases out of ten, now by the new arrangement it will only be restricted in one case out of ten. I do not put that before the Committee as an absolutely accurate statement, but I put it as representing my own view of the changes that have been made. As to one point, however, there can be no doubt whatever, and that is each successive change has been in the direction of the view entertained from the first by Her Majesty's Government. Our rights in the matter lapsed when we got the concession which secured the right of appeal in all cases which were external to purely Australian interests. But our interests in the matter remained because in our conviction it was to the advantage of Australia that it should maintain in the fullest degree this right of appeal, and that they should have thoroughly impartial and authoritative Courts to go to, as Canada can go and as Australia has hitherto gone. One other change has been made, which is also of great importance. We have now, with the consent of the five delegates concerned, substituted the leave of the Court for the leave of the Government. It is now, therefore, a purely judicial affair. In any case, even in a very limited class of cases in which constitutional questions arise—in which purely Australian constitutional questions arise in the High Court—the High Court may give leave to appeal; and, having regard to the unanimous opinion of the highest legal authorities in Australia as to this right of appeal, and apparently to the general conviction on the part of the majority, at any rate, of the legal profession and the majority of the commercial classes, I cannot doubt that in cases of real importance such leave would certainly be given. I have communicated to the whole of the Governments the proposals at which we have arrived. I have also communicated to them the fact that these proposals are recommended unanimously by the delegates in this country, but I have not had up to the present time any official reply from these Governments.

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.): When did you communicate with them?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: On Saturday. There has been time for a reply, because one or two Governments have communicated, but they have not dealt definitely with this matter. If, however, one may draw a conclusion from other sources, from what has appeared in the newspapers and in reports from Australia, it would seem that the new proposals are likely to give general satisfaction. There is one further remark which I think I ought to make. I owe it to Mr. Dickson to say that while he has joined in recommending this proposal he has stated very fairly that neither he nor I is a lawyer, and that we may as laymen have misapprehended the effect of the proposals. I hope that that is not the case, and I am confirmed I think, in my opinion, as to the effect of these proposals by the stronger and much more valuable opinion of the Attorney General. I think it right to say that Mr. Dickson put forward a caveat, that if it should be found that the effect of the new clause is not as I have stated it he would not feel himself bound by the recommendations he has made. I will only add that I think the Committee will understand that while we rejoice very much that the Australians have voluntarily come so far in what we believe is the direction of their true interests in this matter, we desire nothing but to carry out their wishes, whatever they are. Therefore, if it should happen, as it may—although I have no reason to anticipate it—that in the interval between now and the report stage they should unanimously or by a majority desire any further change, always provided it does not interfere with the Imperial interests already guarded, I shall be prepared to propose such change to the Committee. I am not, therefore, binding myself to an absolutely final arrangement. That is a matter which, in my opinion, rests with the Australian colonies. I only ask the Committee now to pass in the form in which I put them forward the Amendments before the House, believing at all events they will go a long way in the direction of satisfying all the interests concerned.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 14, to leave out from the word 'Notwithstanding,' to the word 'State,' in line 18, both inclusive."—(Mr. Secretary Chamberlain.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

*MR. HALDANE (Haddingtonshire): The right hon. Gentleman has quite reasonably proposed to take the discussion on the new proposal of the Government at this moment, although it comes long before we reach Clause 74. When the right hon. Gentleman went on to suggest, as I understood him, that in this proposal there was really nothing calling for a prolonged discussion, I, for one, am unable to agree with him. Looking at the clause which he now proposes, it seems to me that the position which he takes up is widely different from the position he took up upon the First Reading. I feel all the more encouraged to call the attention of the Committee to this fact, because we are placed in a most extraordinary position by the course adopted by the right hon. Gentleman. What is that position? The clause which we are now called upon to debate is one which most of us have seen only within the last few hours. It was not on the Blue Paper, for on that Paper there appears a clause which has been printed, and which has been there for upwards of three weeks. Therefore, we have all been entitled to assume that that was the clause which indicated the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, and we have been encouraged in that belief because it remained there and was circulated as late as Saturday morning last, notwithstanding the storm of adverse criticism by which it was received by almost every Government in Australia.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I ask him to bear in mind that we have yet had no official criticism from any of the Governments to which he alludes.

*MR. HALDANE: I know that the right hon. Gentleman himself has rather an affection for newspaper reports and telegrams, and I collected a considerable bundle of opinions and criticisms on this subject which appeared in The Times and other newspapers, as telegraphed from Australia, and which certainly did indicate very great dissatisfaction with the clause as it appeared on the Blue Paper. I believed until a very recent time—for it so happens that I had information in advance—that the clause as it appeared on the Blue Paper was the clause which we were going to discuss. But within the last few hours there has been circulated another Paper containing a totally different clause, and one which falls very far short of what the right hon. Gentleman laid down as his standard in the discussion on the First Reading of the Bill. I say at once that I enter upon this discussion with the strong desire that this should not be made in any sense a contentious Bill. We all wish to get it through, and I will simply remind the Committee how most of those hon. Members who are with me regard this Bill as a whole. We felt that, so far as Australia was concerned, it was for the Australians to shape the measure in their own fashion. We felt that with regard to the question of the right of appeal it was an important question, which ought not to have been allowed to rise, and would not have arisen if, two years ago, when this question first came forward, the Government had been a little more in earnest about creating an Imperial Court of Appeal. Had this been done we should probably not have had these difficulties with which we are face to face at this moment. My contention is that the Amendment now brought forward is more objectionable, as affecting Imperial interests and the scope and power of the Privy Council, than the clause as it originally stood. I desire to put it in as simple language as possible. Let me remind the House what the various stages of this matter have been. Clause 74, as it was brought forward by the Delegates, provided that no appeal should be permitted in regard to any question of the interpretation of the Constitution unless that question involved the public interest of Her Majesty's dominions outside Australia. In other words, where the public interest of Her Majesty's dominions outside Australia are concerned it was proposed that there should be an appeal to the Privy Council. My chief complaint against the new clause is that the right hon. Gentleman has dropped out of this question all reference to questions of public interest in Her Majesty's dominions outside Australia, and has substituted a definition which does not cover the same field, and which precludes from the review of the Privy Council a number of questions which may be of very great Imperial moment, and for which no provision is made in the words of the right hon. Gentleman's new clause. The first Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman made was after the debate on the Second Reading. In the debate on the First Reading the right hon. Gentleman had laid down his position very plainly. He said on the 14th of May last—

“What I say is that there is no such unanimity as should make us hesitate in a matter of this vast importance, at all events, to take time, and, for the present at any rate, retain the right of appeal as it now exists.”

Some of us thought that was going too far, but on the 21st of May last he announced for the first time his compromise, and he said—

“The effect of this understanding will be that Clause 74 will be exactly reversed; that whereas in the original clause appeal was to cease in all cases except where the public interests of some portion of Her Majesty’s dominions outside Australia were concerned, in the clause as we now propose to insert it, an appeal will lie in every case except in those cases in which Australian interests alone are concerned. That, I think, gets rid of practically every one of the difficulties I anticipated when I referred to the original clause in introducing the Bill.”

Now my right hon friend the Member for East Fife, who followed the right hon. Gentleman in that debate, naturally received the right hon. Gentleman’s explanation with some reserve, although we were all glad to know that something in the nature of a compromise had been arrived at. But what we have here is not a compromise. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that a compromise is a transaction between parties who have differed and in which something is given up by each party in order to secure unanimity. In this case the right hon. Gentleman not only gives up that which is claimed, but he also gives up something which was not asked for. The right hon. Gentleman’s proposal gives up now the exception of public interest—which was conceded by the delegates—affecting the Queen’s dominions outside Australia, an exception which never was in controversy, and he has introduced a clause excluding this right. Both under the clause which the right hon. Gentleman first proposed, and under the clause which he now proposes, he excludes from the Privy Council important questions which would have been included in the proposals as originally drafted by the delegates. The first proposal of the right hon. Gentleman declared that no question—of any State or States, or as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of any two or more States shall be capable of final decision except by the High Court, and no appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council from any decision of the High Court on any such question unless by the consent of the Executive Government or Governments concerned, to be signified in writing.”

That is the clause which was so fiercely assailed in Australia. In the first place it has been said that there was there an objectionable provision in regard to the introduction of the Executive Governments into matters of judicial concern. I do not wonder that that proposal raised a storm of hostile criticism in Australia. But there is another point, and it is in regard to the expression “final decision.” It was pointed out that this clause applied not only to public controversies between Governments, but that it applied also to private litigation, and that if the clause passed, a private litigant might find himself in this position; he had fought his case and been unsuccessful, and his opponent had taken him to the Privy Council or he had taken his opponent there. There somebody raises the contention that there is a question of the limits, inter se, of the legislative powers of the two Governments and the validity of the Colonial Act may be questioned. In such a case the Privy Council would have been bound to say, under the wording of the clause, “we cannot listen to you, for we are precluded from hearing the case, and we are bound to send it to the High Court.” That was felt to be a clause which was altogether intolerable, and it has been made the subject of severe criticism. Now that obnoxious expression “final decision” has been got rid of, I am glad to say, and now we are face to face with a new clause which has appeared on the Paper for the first time to-day.

“No appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council from a decision of the High Court upon any question howsoever arising as to the limits inter se of the Constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and those of any State or States, or as to the limits inter se of the Constitutional powers of any two or more States, unless the High Court shall certify that the question is one which ought to be determined by Her Majesty in Council.”

It is quite true that there is a class of question which was excluded by the original clause of the delegates which this clause permits. For instance, suppose there arises a question under the power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government extended by the specific provisions of Clause 51 outside the region of Australia, and outside territorial limits—the question would arise as to whether legislation in the colony would be ultra vires. Now under the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman that would be appealable which could not have been so under the original clause. But this is a very rare case. I have had some experience in these matters in Canada, and during an observation extending over fifteen years I do not know a single instance of such a question arising. I know of an instance arising in the case of one of the Australasian colonies as to a bigamy law which was said to have been passed in such terms as to extend to an offence committed outside the limits of Australia, and the Privy Council held that the effective scope of the statute did not extend outside those limits. But not one question in a hundred which arise will be of this nature, but questions of another class will arise constantly. Let me take a concrete case which arose within my own knowledge with regard to British Columbia. Litigation arose there in reference to the employment of Chinese labour in a colliery. A Bill had been brought before the legislature for the prohibition of female and child labour in mines, and someone moved an amendment to add the words “and Chinamen” to this prohibition. The shareholders, finding that Chinamen were being employed, brought the question before the court, applying for an injunction. When this litigation arose some ingenious person in the case raised the objection that power to legislate for aliens was reserved exclusively to the Dominion Parliament, and that the legislation of British Columbia was ultra vires. The point was one of importance because there was a treaty between Her Majesty and the Emperor of China which gave the most-favoured-nation treatment to Chinese subjects, and there was a question as to whether this was not affected by the legislation alluded to. This was a question affecting the Queen's dominions outside Canada, and the matter came before the Privy Council, and they declared that the legislation was ultra vires, and in that way they got rid of the matter. I will take another illustration. There was a great case about eighteen months ago between Ontario and Quebec and the Dominion Government, which arose in regard to the control over the great lakes and the great rivers in Canada. That was a matter in which the Imperial Government were interested, because it was a question in which the rights of the American as well as the Canadian fishermen were involved. It was felt that the matter should not be left in the hands of the provincial Government, having regard to the complications which might arise. The matter came before the Privy Council, and it was ultimately decided that it was not within the power of any Province of Canada to deal with this matter at all. I give these illustrations because they are cases which arose undoubtedly as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers in the Dominion of Canada. I think the Committee will appreciate the reason why I do this. These were cases where the public interest of the Queen's dominions outside Canada were vitally concerned, and in which there was a right of appeal under the Constitution. Such cases may arise in relation to Australia, and in such an emergency there would have been a right of appeal under the Bill which the delegates introduced, but there will be no such appeal under the clause which the right hon. Gentleman has presented to the House. That seems to me to be a consideration which, at all events, should entitle us at this stage to ask for a little more time than we have had to consider a clause which hardly one of us saw before a few hours ago, and which now comes before us for discussion practically for the first time. It is quite true that the clause of the right hon. Gentleman has some advantages—for example, it makes it clear that there can be an appeal from the State Court even upon a constitutional question to the Privy Council. I think that was probably not so under the Bill as it originally stood, but what an extraordinary provision it is. The clause provides that if you have litigation in the State upon a constitutional question you may appeal either to the Privy Council or the High Court. If you appeal to the High Court the decision is to be final unless the High Court gives you leave to appeal to the Privy Council. It is, in other words, a court of final jurisdiction upon this matter. Supposing a litigant takes his case first to the Privy Council and succeeds, his opponent may, in another case, raising the same point, take him up to the High Court to get round the difficulty, which he can do because the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman gives him a right of appeal. But that is a totally different appeal to the one in Canada, because there the Supreme Court is not a court of final jurisdiction. As the clause makes the High Court of Australia a court of final jurisdiction, there may well be conflicting decisions between the High Court and the Privy Council. I do not think that is an academic matter. I for one protest against pronouncing an opinion upon this question with only a few hours consideration, and without an opportunity of anything like full discussion. It may be said that these matters are more or less technical; but, after all, what is there in this measure about which there is any controversy except this right of appeal to the Privy Council? I am not one of those who ever have insisted upon that right. I am quite prepared to say that the views of the delegates are entitled to great weight, and I am prepared to allow the people of Australia to prefer the decision of the Australian Courts upon questions affecting the interpretation of the Constitution. But what I do protest against is the right hon. Gentleman coming here and taking a high constitutional attitude and telling us that the right of appeal was to remain as it stood, and then coming down here with a clause which gives away more than the delegates ever asked for. It seems to me that what we have got here is not a compromise at all. Surely we ought to have a little more time to consider these matters more fully than is possible at the present moment. There are vital questions involved in this Bill which concern not merely the Government of Australia but they affect Imperial interests as well, and we ought to be allowed sufficient time to make up our minds in a satisfactory manner. I am aware that the right hon. Gentleman has had a most difficult task in negotiating this matter, but I protest against the way in which the right hon. Gentleman is asking Parliament to come to a decision in this matter, just as if the issue was a comparatively simple one.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): I was very glad to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman urge that this Bill should not be treated as a contentious Bill, and I am quite sure it will not be so regarded. At the same time I was a little bewildered by the hon. and learned Gentleman's attitude on this Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that this clause gives the delegates more than they ever asked for—that so far from being a compromise it gives them all they originally asked for and something more. That is the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. HALDANE: I did not say all, but I quite admit that something has been added, although it is very small.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I am glad to hear that qualification, although the statement in the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech was that the clause was not a compromise, and that it gave the delegates all that they asked for and something more. I am satisfied that not only is the view propounded by the hon. and learned Gentleman absolutely novel, but that it is one which will not commend itself to anyone who has studied the matter at all. I would remind the hon. and learned Member that when this Bill, in the form in which it came from Australia, was under consideration in the House the hon. and learned Member suggested that it should be accepted in the form in which it came from Australia. I am not going to occupy the time of the Committee with technical matters, but a reference to the broad features of the Bill will show that the hon. and learned Member's view with regard to the comparative effect of the Amendment before the Committee is really without any substantial foundation. It is not of very much use to appeal in this matter to experience gathered in other fields, because in this Bill we have to deal with enactments of a very peculiar and very special kind. I will ask the Committee to refer to the terms of the Constitution. They confer upon the Parliament of the Commonwealth power to make laws with regard to a great many matters, and I will direct attention to two or three of them, as showing the class of questions which might arise. Under Head 10 power is given to make laws as to fisheries in Australian waters beyond the territorial limits. Head 29 refers to external affairs, and Head 30 to the relations of the Commonwealth with the Islands of the Pacific. There are several others which I might mention, but these are sufficient for my purpose. With regard to every one of these heads, questions of very great gravity might arise as to the extent of the powers which have been conferred upon the Parliament of the Commonwealth. Take the question of the power to deal with Australian fisheries beyond territorial limits. The question might arise, what are Australian fisheries not within the territorial limits? What are the powers to be exercised with regard to the persons who may frequent these fisheries? With regard to external affairs it is unnecessary to point out the wide scope that might be attributed to words of that kind. In connection with all these heads questions of very great importance as to the extent of the delegation to be conferred on the Parliament of the Commonwealth might arise. I cannot at all agree with my hon. and learned friend that only in very exceptional cases questions as to the extent of these powers would arise. I venture to say that they would arise in nine cases out of ten. What I desire to draw the attention of the Committee to is this—that the question of what powers have been delegated to the Australian legislatures, whether the legislatures in common or the legislature in each State, may be matter of grave Imperial concern; but how these powers, having been delegated, are to be distributed as between the central and the local legislatures will be almost invariably a matter of Australian concern. It may be of the utmost possible importance to determine accurately what is the extent of the powers delegated under Article 51. But the question whether a certain power is to be exercised by the central legislature or the local legislature is a question of Australian importance and almost entirely of Australian importance. My hon. and learned friend says the Bill as it came from Australia provided that in matters affecting the public interest of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions an appeal would be allowed. That is perfectly true. I do not intend to comment upon the extreme vagueness of such language as "the public interest of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions," but it is language which would introduce uncertainty into a class of cases where certainty is eminently desirable. No one would know what was covered by that assumption, but when my hon. and learned friend looks back with regret to these words which appear in the Bill as it came from Australia he forgets altogether that there was an exception engrafted on the prohibition of the right to appeal. The prohibition of the right of appeal extended to all constitutional questions. It was provided by Article 74 as it came from Australia that no appeal on any question affecting the construction of the Constitution would lie except where the public interest of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions was concerned. Now we, by this clause, eliminate altogether the prohibition of appeal on constitutional questions generally, and we confine the prohibition to the one case of conflict as between a State and the Commonwealth or as between two States, as to by which of them the power conferred should be exercised. If the question is whether the power is to be delegated at all, then an appeal would lie subject to leave from Her Majesty. But if the question is not one of delegation, but merely of distribution, and as to whether, the powers having been conceded, they are to be exercised by the central or the local legislature, then there is no appeal from the decision of the High Court, unless the High Court thinks fit for special reasons to certify an appeal. My hon. and learned friend put a case which I confess rather surprised me. He said, and it is the case, that this clause as it now stands leaves absolutely unfettered the right of appeal to the Privy Council. As the Bill stands any litigant may take any point including constitutional questions of this kind straight from the Supreme Court of the State to the Privy Council. There is no doubt about that at all. Then my hon. and learned friend asks what would happen, suppose a litigant takes a point of that kind to the Privy Council and it is decided, and that the same point arises in another case and is taken to the High Court. In that case, of course, the High Court will follow, and would be bound to follow the decision given by the Privy Council.

MR. HALDANE: Does the Privy Council also follow the High Court?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: Certainly not, because it is not usual for the Appellate Court to follow the Court below. The very clause which my hon. and learned friend has been criticising provides that, should the High Court think fit to certify that the case is one proper to be heard on appeal, then the case may go to the Privy Council. I do ask the Committee whether a more extraordinary proposition was ever put forward than that, after the Privy Council, to which the High Court was allowed to appeal, had decided a particular point in one way, the High Court should decide the same point in another way and refuse leave to appeal to the Privy Council. I venture to say that a graver observation touching the constitution of a Court never was made. If there were any special circumstances which led the High Court to think that the decision of the Privy Council in the first case was not altogether applicable in the second case, they would of course under these circumstances grant leave to appeal, and the matter would come before the Privy Council. This clause shows that the Privy Council is recognised as the ultimate Appellate Court, altogether in deference to Australian feeling, only for special reasons, and that the High Court is to certify before there can be an appeal. I venture to think that the case quoted by my hon. and learned friend is a perfectly impossible one, and that something in the nature of apology is due to the prospective High Court from him. Then my hon. and learned friend put a very interesting case of legislation with respect to Chinese labour as a case of conflict between a local and central authority in which it would be important that there should be an appeal. I would remind my hon. and learned friend that in the Bill as it came from Australia, it was very far indeed from being clear that there would have been an appeal in such a case. I doubt whether it could have been held that "the public interest of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions was concerned," or that the case would be considered as coming within the exception giving the right of appeal. The case, however, is one of the most exceptional character. I venture to think that we have dealt with nine-tenths of the cases which will arise under the constitution. As to how the powers delegated are to be distributed in Australia the Imperial Government is, as a rule, not concerned. My hon. and learned friend also said that there ought to be time to consider the effect of this clause. I recognise the weight of any suggestion from my hon. and learned friend, but I would remind him, and I would remind the Committee, that there is a very strong desire in Australia that there should be no further delay in the prosecution of this measure. I would also remind the Committee that there will be a further opportunity, after this Bill has passed through Committee, of discussing questions of importance on Report.

MR. HALDANE: I understand that the Australian States have not expressed any opinion on this Amendment. It was only drafted on Saturday and cabled out on Saturday night, and now, on Monday, we are asked to accept it.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I would ask my hon. and learned friend not to forget that there is a very great desire in Australia that this Bill should be passed with reasonable expedition. What that expedition is will be for the Committee to decide. One observation before I sit down. I much regret that my hon. and learned friend seems to be under the impression that this Amendment put on the Paper by the right hon. Gentleman introduces an alternative appeal to the Privy Council or the High Court.

MR. HALDANE: That was in the last edition but one.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: It is embodied in this Amendment, and was introduced in the last Amendment as well.

MR. HALDANE: We did not know what it was.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: That is not the point. The point is that my hon. and learned friend says that an alternative appeal is introduced, and he drew a ghastly picture of what might result from a litigant going from one Court to another. But my hon. and learned friend must remember that the Bill as it came from Australia provided for that alternative appeal.

MR. HALDANE: I said so, because there was an appeal in all cases, except constitutional cases, in the Bill as it came from Australia. But you have now taken away the right of the Privy Council to give leave to appeal, and you make the High Court the supreme court in constitutional questions.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I do not think that my hon. and learned friend appreciates my point. He put it that the evil of an alternative appeal was the result of something done by my right hon. friend the Secretary for the Colonies. The alternative appeal was in the Bill as it came from Australia. Under that Bill a litigant might go from the Supreme Court of the State straight to the Privy Council on any constitutional question, or instead of going to the Privy Council might go straight to the High Court, but there was this most objectionable state of things under that provision, that unless the matter fell within the exception namely as a constitutional matter affecting public grounds, the decision of the High Court was absolutely final. Under the Bill as it came from Australia it might well have been said that the High Court and the Privy Council were courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction and that the High Court had leave to go its own way. So far from having introduced that evil, what my hon. friend has done as the result of negotiations has been to remove all objectionable results from it, because it is now provided that the High Court may for special reasons grant leave to appeal even in the very limited class of cases in which the decision of the High Court is promulgated as one not the subject of appeal to the Privy Council. I do not claim to have converted my hon. and learned friend on this subject, but I hope I have satisfied the Committee that the sacrifice of these words which he so much laments, "unless the public interest in some other part of Her Majesty's dominions is concerned," is not one to be regretted at all. We have reserved the right of appeal in nine-tenths of the cases which may arise, and all we have done is to provide for no appeal except by special leave in a very limited class of cases—in which 999 out of every 1,000 would not be affected—relating to purely Australian matters.

SIR R. T. REID (Dumfriesshire): I think it is much to be regretted in regard to this debate that it should have ever been necessary. We recognise the difficulties the Colonial Secretary has had to contend with, but the more we think over the matter the more we must regret that it was thought necessary in any degree to interfere with the measure as it was sent from Australia. Let us see for a single moment how the matter stands. There was very great difficulty in the Australian colonies in coming to a concordance upon terms. A long time was lost and a great deal of labour and ingenuity was spent, and at last the colonies came to an agreement. The result of that agreement was sent over to this country. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies unfortunately considered that it was necessary to make an alteration with regard to one subject, and that was the matter of appeal to the Privy Council. With the aid of the most expert legal advice, with the goodwill and assistance of the delegates from Australia, we have proceeded from one suggestion to a second, and then to a third, and at last we have to-day a still further alteration proposed to us, without being able to claim the assent of the Australian Governments or the Australian colonies to anything except what was originally proposed. It has been considered apparently by the legal advisers of the Government that some alteration was necessary in order to preserve the right of appeal to the Privy Council. I want the Committee to consider for a moment what is the real importance of appeal to the Privy Council. I think it is a very desirable thing to retain if we can, but I think it ought never to be imposed on the colonies, unless they wished it. I do not attach any great Imperial or constitutional importance to the preservation of the right of appeal by private individuals in matters of private importance to them. It is only when matters of public importance arise that any significance attaches to the right of appeal. What is the difference between the present proposals of the Government and the proposals made in the original Bill as sent over from Australia? According to the original Bill, in every private case—and these would be the great majority—unless a question as to the interpretation of the constitution arose, the right of appeal was preserved. That is to say, that the right of appeal was proposed by the Australians themselves to be reserved in eighteen out of twenty, and even ninety-nine out of every hundred cases in any way likely to come over to this country, and the only restriction proposed upon the right of appeal was when questions of constitutional interpretation arose under the Act, which must be comparatively rare. But it was thought by the Australians that the right of finally deciding the interpretation of their own Constitution should rest upon themselves. They also made the concession that if the public interest of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions was involved there might be the right of appeal. That was to be a question for the Privy Council to determine. I do not at all doubt that strong legal advice was pressed upon the right hon. Gentleman by very eminent authorities, but it seems to me that the restriction on the right of appeal as originally proposed by the Australians themselves must only affect and could only apply in a few cases. However, unfortunately, the view of the Government was otherwise, and they commenced to make alterations. As the Committee is aware, we have had not much notice of the last alteration, but we will have an opportunity of discussing and considering it again on the Report stage. From the time when the original proposals were first made to the present there has been nothing but difference—friendly and respectful I quite admit—between the Government on the one side and one section or another of Australian opinion on the other. There has been, unfortunately, differences between the Australian colonies themselves in regard to what, after all, are very small matters in comparison with the enormous interests dealt with by this Bill. I would wish to point out to the Committee how comparatively small the real difference is between what was originally proposed in the Australian Bill and what is now suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. There was no restriction at all under the Australian Bill except in cases of constitutional interpretation, and even then there was no restriction if the public interest in any other part of Her Majesty's dominions was concerned. What have we got instead of that? I think myself that the difference is so small as not to justify all the trouble that has been taken and the risk which has been run of losing the Bill. The proposal now is that on questions of constitutional interpretation there shall be no appeal unless the High Court certifies an appeal. That is a difference which it seems to me ought not to occasion any difficulty. If I were an Australian I would very likely consider it a very proper clause; but I think it is a great pity that it was ever proposed here. The right hon. Gentleman says that he does not now know whether the Australian Governments are in favour of his proposal, and that he may learn between now and Report that some other scheme will be satisfactory to them, in which case he says—and most wisely says—that he will instantly lay it before the House provided it does not interfere with his views as to the duty of the Imperial Government as trustees for the whole Empire. I most heartily hope that some proposal will be made—nothing could be more eminently satisfactory, from my point of view, than that some proposal should be made—to put an end to this difference—a difference which I think is very trifling—on a very important Bill, and which has given a great deal more trouble than it need have done. But if not, I think the Australian colonies would be very well advised if they accepted the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. It will do no harm, I believe, to their Constitution, and certainly it contains no element of injustice or unfairness. But if they do not do so, and continue to express, what exists to a considerable extent in Australia, a decided preference for the form of the Bill to which they all agreed in the first instance, I would express the hope that the Government even now, after having done their best according to their own view of their duty, will revert to the Australian view, which I think is perfectly harmless and cannot in any degree interfere with Imperial interests.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University): The right hon. the Colonial Secretary said he hoped that any discussion that took place this evening would be on this particular clause, but as my criticism will rather point to a suggestion of a slight increase in the legislative power given in the clause, I hope I shall not be out of order in making some general remarks on the subject. I do not wish to go into the question of the delegation or distribution of powers. I followed the difficulties and the subtleties of the hon. and learned Member for East Lothian, and was painfully convinced by the arguments of the Attorney General that his fears were unfounded. I, however, pass from that, and will venture, in spite of all that has been said as to the propriety of our leaving the matter entirely to the Australians, to express, what I hope is not improper, some interest in the working of this Constitution as we expect it to develop in the future history of the colonies. The Appeal clause in the Bill originally submitted by the colonies to the Government was extremely difficult to allow in the form in which it was drawn, because it was so complicated and obscure that it was likely to lead to bickering and difficulty between the home Government and the colonies. I preferred the clause which was submitted to us shortly after the Bill was introduced, though it appeared to me to have some defects which, if it were before us now, I should have pointed out as a source of danger. The present clause seems to me to confine the matters on which there is to be no review of the Privy Council to very distinct and reasonable limits, and I only regret that the Government departed from what I still think was a counsel of perfection when they first presented the Bill to the House—the retention of the right of appeal as it exists, I believe, for the Dominion of Canada. I wish to impress on this House that we are throwing upon this High Court the decision without review of questions which are very likely to impair its character and its utility in the Australian colonies. The questions that will come before it are questions as to the distribution of power between the Federal Government and the States, and anyone who has followed the history of the Supreme Court in America must know that these are the questions which have most tried the firmness, and have even to some extent impaired the character, of that Court. The cases which will come before the High Court under this clause without doubt will be cases in which the Federal Legislature or the Executive will be alleged to have exceeded its powers as against some one of the States; and, therefore, the issue will be to some extent a political issue. They are the more likely to arise because it must be remembered that the Australian colonies are not going into this federation from any external pressure, but of their own initiative, and because they believe that their voice will sound with greater force and volume in the affairs of the Empire as a Commonwealth than as separate colonies. The cases which will come before the High Court will be cases in which the Legislature or the Executive of the Commonwealth will be one of the litigants, and a State or States will be the other. But it must be borne in mind that the appointment of the judges of the High Court will rest with the Executive of the Commonwealth; and there is no limit to the number constituting the High Court. Thus it is conceivable that when some great political issue as to the federal power is before the Court, or is likely to, come before it, it may happen—as I believe it has happened in the United States—that the members of the Court would be gradually increased or diminished according to the wish of the Executive, so that a particular decision or course of policy of a certain character may be determined and arrived at in a certain way. This consideration points to the desirableness of securing the High Court from any possible imputation on its character by granting an appeal to the Privy Council; and if this were done no conceivable motive or reason for affecting the composition of the Court could arise. Though it seems paradoxical to say so, the very fact that the decisions were subject to appeal, and were not to be final, would, I believe, increase the finality of their character—that is to say, they would be accepted without hesitation because they would be above suspicion, inasmuch as the ultimate decision would lie with the Privy Council. I wish it were possible to go back to the original decision of the Government to retain the right of appeal in all cases; but as this is no longer possible I venture to suggest that the Federal Legislature should have power, without an amendment of the Constitution, to restore the right of appeal in those political and constitutional cases which were defined in the amending clause. If, after a term of years, it is found that the character of the High Court is suffering, it might well be that the Commonwealth Parliament might desire to restore the right of appeal to the Privy Council, but it could not do so without the very cumbersome process of amending the Constitution. If, however, the delegates were agreed on that subject a few amending words would give the Commonwealth Parliament the power I suggest. That would be of the greatest advantage. I know that it is risky to prophesy regarding the working of a Constitution, because no Constitution ever worked out as its authors or students ever expected; but I think that my suggestion would be an assistance in the working out of the Australian Constitution, and might be found useful for preventing any possible diminution in the respect which we all hope will be granted to the High Court of the Commonwealth. I do not think that in making this suggestion I can be accused of giving any cause of offence. It seems to me not to be friendly or hardly altogether respectful to the colonies to say, "Take your Constitution if you want it, so long as it does not interfere with Imperial concerns, and make the best of it." We are all interested in the character and conditions of this Australian Constitution; and we are all desirous to see the stones of the fabric laid on the surest foundation, and to promote the ultimate prosperity of these great colonies in which we are so much concerned; and it is for that reason I have ventured to make the suggestion.

*MR. ASQUITH: I think the Committee will realise that we are approaching the consideration of a question of the highest importance under conditions of grave embarrassment. We are, on both sides of the House, I believe, equally impressed with the desire to put no obstacle of any kind in the way of the speedy attainment by our Australian fellow-subjects of a scheme of federation, but I think we might be well advised in the circumstances of the case in asking you, Sir, to report progress and to ask leave to sit again. The House has heard the speech of my hon. and learned friend the Member for Haddingtonshire and the reply of the Attorney General. My hon. and learned friend is of opinion that the clause in the form it has at present assumed does not safeguard the interests of the rest of the Empire as distinguished from Australia with the same clearness and efficiency as the clause which came from Australia. The Attorney General is of a different opinion. Again, my hon. and learned friend contends that you may have under this clause two irreconcilable decisions, one by the Privy Council and the other by the High Court in Australia, in reference to the same subject matter in the same State. The Attorney General thinks, I do not know upon what ground, that the High Court would be bound to defer to the Privy Council. I do not wish to pronounce any opinion upon either of these contentions, but when we are asked to pass a clause which did not appear in print until four o'clock this afternoon, and in regard to the interpretation of which these high authorities are in complete antagonism, it is surely placing a very great tax upon the confidence of the House. Even if we had been considering a Private Bill, and not a Constitution, we should have had an opportunity of careful deliberation and of arriving at an opinion which would then be, possibly, of some value. I hope I shall not be accused by anyone of wishing to delay the passage of this Bill or of disrespect either to the Imperial Government or the delegates who have been concerned in these negotiations if I refer to the history of this clause as not creditable to our way of doing business. What does it consist of? The Bill in its original shape, as it was brought from Australia, was submitted to the whole of the Australian people, after prolonged deliberations in their various Legislatures. The Imperial Government, as we now know, took no effective means of conveying to the Australian people what, a moment after the Bill arrived here, they discovered to be a matter of Imperial concern and a real danger to the unity of the Empire. The Australian people having passed the Bill in the shape in which it was passed without any warning whatsoever that apprehensions of that kind had been or were about to be entertained upon this side of the water, the delegates came over here with a restricted mandate, having no power to do anything, as it appeared, but to agree to pass the Bill in the form in which it was assented to by the Australian people. That is the first stage of the matter. Then we come to the First Reading of the Bill in this House, when the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary devoted a very large part of his speech to showing that the Australian delegates were not authentic exponents of the opinion of Australia, that that opinion could be better collected from other sources, which he specified, and that that opinion was hostile to the clause as it was passed upon referendum to the Australian people, and was in favour of an unrestricted right of appeal. The Bill as it was presented to this House on the First Reading gave an absolutely unrestricted right of appeal. That was the second stage. A week later came the Second Reading, when the matter assumed a third and totally different aspect. The delegates, who had had a restricted mandate which did not authorise them to alter a single comma in the Bill, appear to have agreed with the right hon. Gentleman to a form of clause which was totally inconsistent with the position taken up by him on the First Reading of the Bill, and imposed on the right of appeal those very restrictions which he had declared to be fatal or dangerous to the unity of the Empire or to the interests of the Empire. The House will remember the speech the right hon. Gentleman delivered.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think the right hon. Gentleman misunderstands me. I never said that the restrictions on the right of appeal in purely Australian cases would affect the interests of the Empire, and it is to that we have now absolutely confined this Bill.

*MR. ASQUITH: My argument is, of course, directed to Clause 74, which never did anything at all to restrict the right of appeal except in relation to constitutional questions. The right hon. Gentleman knows that the general right of appeal has always been unimpaired. That was the third phase. I spoke upon that occasion, and I welcomed the understanding which had been arrived at between the right hon. Gentleman and the delegates, because I thought that far too much fuss had been made over this business, and if any arrangement was come to the House might readily assent to it. Now we come to the fourth stage in the history of this transaction. The clause which represented, I will not call it the compromise, but the arrangement come to between the right hon. Gentleman and the unauthorised delegates at the time of the Second Reading, which had been on the Paper for three weeks, and which had been the subject of comment and discussion not only in Australia but in this country, completely disappeared as late as Saturday morning last; and we have had put before us this afternoon, without any notice, a clause containing an entirely different proposition. I think it is a distinct improvement, but it is an entirely new proposition, and we have never had an opportunity of considering it. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that on Saturday, though he had the knowledge that the delegates had absolutely no authority to assent to this clause, he had telegraphed to the Australian Governments to know whether they had assented to it, and at this moment he is entirely without information from any one of those Governments, who alone are in a position to say whether this clause is contrary to the opinion of Australia or not. For the House, in such conditions, to seriously discuss in a Bill like this a clause of such vital importance is entirely without precedent, and if a precedent of this kind is to be made it ought not to be made without a protest in the House itself. When we get to the report stage it may turn out that the Australian Governments do not approve of the action of the delegates, and we may have put before us a fifth and different proposal. I do think that the House has hardly been treated with the respect to which it is entitled in a matter of this gravity. It would have been the easiest thing in the world, if the Colonial Secretary only made this arrangement as late as Saturday last, to have deferred the Committee on this Bill for a few days, until we had an opportunity of knowing what the opinion of Australia was, and also some opportunity of considering ourselves these difficult and legal considerations. For my part I entirely decline at this stage to commit myself to the clause as it stands. I claim for myself, and I think every Member of the House is entitled to it, complete freedom, at a later stage, to consider it upon its merits. I do not think that we should be doing our duty if we allowed this occasion to pass without making this protest against a proceeding which I think is entirely without precedent.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I sympathise very much with a great deal of what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman as to a certain inconvenience attending the proceedings with regard to this Bill, and I quite agree with him that the circumstances are entirely unprecedented. I quite agree with him also that if we were dealing with a Bill of our own, an English Bill, even a Private Bill, we could not think for a moment of pressing for a conclusion this afternoon, but would readily accept a suggestion coming from any quarter of the House for a further postponement. I admit all that. But how the right hon. Gentleman, who knows the circumstances of this case, and knows exactly what are the difficulties with which I have had to deal, can accuse me of want of respect to the House because I have adopted the course I have taken, I cannot possibly conceive. I have taken this course simply because I have been requested to do so by the Australian delegates. To the right hon. Gentleman that may be an insufficient authority, but for those who again and again in these proceedings have called upon us not to flout the opinion of the whole of the Australian people, not to flout their representatives, not to insult them by suggesting amendments to their Bill, to say to us that no attention whatever should have been paid to the unanimous request of the Australian delegates, even at this late period, seems to me a very inconsistent argument.

*MR. ASQUITH: What I said was that surely the House of Commons is entitled to have a few days to consider the proposal.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I entirely agree that if the House of Commons desires a postponement they must have it. Nobody would think of rejecting anything like a general desire of the House of Commons, or a desire expressed by the leaders of the Opposition, in regard to such a matter. But, of course, in that case they will understand that they are taking upon themselves the responsibility of delaying the measure. Whether that in itself is a serious matter or not is for them to consider. We press it, not because we have the slightest interest as a Government in pressing it, but because we thought it was our duty to put before the Committee the wishes of the Australian delegates in the matter. Let me say that I should not, perhaps, have made myself the channel for the expression of that wish if I had not been under the impression, which nothing the right hon. Gentleman has said has removed, that it was the general desire of the House to treat this Bill as chiefly an Australian matter. If the House proposes now to adopt a different view with regard to it, why, of course, I admit that the complication of this particular question and the complication of the whole Bill justifies a much longer delay than we have thought of. I was certainly under the impression that, if I could produce to the House prima facie evidence that an arrangement had been arrived at which on its merits we could approve and which had every prospect of commending itself, not merely to a portion of the Australian colonies, but to the Australian colonies as a whole, in that case we should have the assent of the House for taking the present step. I have to acknowledge the spirit in which the matter has been dealt with by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfriesshire, but still I do venture to differ from him, because he expressed a desire that even at this late stage we should accept the original Bill as presented to us by Australia.

SIR R. T. REID: If you cannot get an agreement out of them.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I hope we have got an agreement otherwise. But he will permit me to say that in my judgment if we were now to go back to the original Bill it would be the most unsatisfactory course that we could possibly take, that it would be the course which would meet with the most resistance in Australia. I think the House will easily see that a matter which even in our short discussions has proved to be highly technical is not one which can be considered to have been before the minds of all the Australian people when they passed the referendum on the principle of the Bill. Now that it has been discussed, it must be evident to every one that there is a very large and growing opinion in favour of retaining an unrestricted right of appeal. I own that my conviction has always been that the Australian people never intended the Bill to be taken or left by this House, to be swallowed whole or to be rejected, and that there was no alternative for our consideration. On the contrary, everything that I have heard leads me to believe that it was supposed we would give our best consideration to the Bill, and that if we found in anything that we thought to be of sufficient importance to merit reconsideration we should not hesitate to put our views before the Australian people; and, as far as I can gather, I believe our efforts in that direction have been thoroughly appreciated. The hon. and learned Gentleman said something about the possibility of exciting displeasure. I have not seen a trace of displeasure. On the contrary, there is a thorough appreciation of the spirit in which we have hitherto dealt with the matter. Our main object has been so to pass this Bill finally as to secure the practically unanimous assent of the Australian Parliaments. The recent alterations, and, as I have said, the first alteration that was proposed, gave us all that we thought it necessary to insist upon. These subsequent alterations are suggestions that have come to us from Australia, and I am not at all ashamed of proposing them again and again. I am not at all touched by the irony of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He talked about a fourth proposal in a few weeks, and said there may be a fifth. [Mr. ASQUITH dissented.] Well, he commented upon it in what I understood was a spirit of deprecation.

MR. ASQUITH: Only as an argument for deliberation.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not deny the possibility, and I shall not be in the least ashamed of coming again with a fifth or a sixth suggestion if it is made to me from Australia. If I have reason to believe that other alterations will still further recommend this Bill as a whole to the Australian people, it will be my duty to submit them, even one after another, to the House. As regards time for deliberation, I hope hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite will see fit to hasten proceedings by allowing this stage, at all events, to pass practically unquestioned. We shall be prepared to allow time for further deliberation on the Report stage, which we will postpone to a date which will be convenient to gentlemen opposite. The proposal to extend the powers of the Federal Parliament made by the hon. Member for the Oxford University is one with which I entirely agree. The Federal Parliament under the Constitution will have power to legislate for limiting the right of appeal, although any legislation of the kind will have to be reserved for Her Majesty's pleasure. My hon. friend says we might still further enlarge the legislative capacity of the Federal Parliament by allowing them to extend the right of appeal as well as to limit it. Upon that point, as

I have said, I agree with him; but at the same time I should not like to introduce the alteration at this stage, or without knowing whether such an increase of legislative power would be likely to be in consonance with the wishes of the Australian Governments and people. But I will take care, as far as I can, to make myself acquainted with the views of the delegates, at all events, on the subject, and if I should find they have no objection I should be very glad to introduce the change on the Report stage. I think there is only one other word I need say. I disagree from the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries, and still more from the hon. and learned Member for Haddingtonshire, as to the view they take of the respective effects of the original Bill and of the Bill as it will stand when we have amended it. The hon. and learned Member for Haddingtonshire actually puts forward the view that our Amendment restricts the right of appeal more than the original Bill. He says that upon a hasty review of the clause as now presented. Let me point out that the whole of his argument applies to the previous proposed Amendment as well as to the Amendment on the Blue Paper, and, although it has been before the people of Australia for the last three months, not a single word was heard from anyone to justify that view. The hon. and learned Gentleman, as far as I know, stands absolutely and entirely alone. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries did not go so far, but he did consider that the original Bill made a slight limitation and restriction of the right of appeal. That is absolutely contrary to the view taken unanimously by the leading judicial authorities in Australia. Whether it is right or not to make the alteration is another matter. When I am told that the Amendments which we have now made do not affect that restriction, I think I can best answer that by saying that by those Amendments we have placed the question of appeal, with one exception, in precisely the same condition in Australia as it is in Canada. The hon. and learned Gentleman approves of the condition of things with regard to appeal in Canada. Let me point out that under the new Amendments we shall be acting in precisely the same way in Australia as in Canada, except that in the limited number of cases where constitutional questions are tried in the High Court leave to appeal will be given in the case of Australia by the High Court, whereas in the case of Canada leave to appeal is given by the Privy Council. That is the only difference. Having brought the right of appeal in Australia so completely or nearly in accord with the right of appeal in Canada, I think we have secured a very great result, and I am only glad to find that in doing so we have the support apparently of the Australian people.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I do not think my right hon. friend has treated the House with any discourtesy, but he had a matter of the most difficult character to deal with. Nor do I think the House of Commons is at all discredited by the way in which this business has been conducted. I think that in this matter we should defer entirely to Australian opinion in all matters which do not touch the interests of the Empire at large. But I urge my right hon. friend to consider whether it would not be better to assent to report progress at this stage, so that we may have some time to consider the exact meaning of this Amendment which we have seen to-day for the first time.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I wish to say a few words, not on the main question of the merits of the proposed clause, but on another point. The right hon. Gentleman has expressed a very strong opinion to the Committee. He has said that the Government will postpone for a short time further the consideration of the Bill at this stage, if the Committee desire; but he has referred to some evils—unknown evils to us—that would arise, and has implied that it would be a great disappointment and calamity if some short prorogation were allowed. I do not understand what the meaning of that may be. I remember it was on the 14th May that the Bill was read a second time, and the stage which really became the critical stage—for there was no opposition at the Second Reading—was postponed for some time. Considerable surprise was felt at the length of the interval which the right hon. Gentleman allowed, because there was nothing in the merits of the case, in the facts themselves, which made so long an interval necessary. But now, on the morning of our consenting to consider the Bill, we have this new clause put before us, and we are told that it is the result of an agreement between the right hon. Gentleman and the delegates, but neither the delegates nor the Minister know what the feeling of Australia is and what the opinion of the Australian Governments is. That is prima facie a very strong case for postponing the consideration of the clause. The right hon. Gentleman adopts a tone which is, I think, entirely satisfactory to the House, when he says that, subject of course to a due regard for our interests, his great desire is to do whatever the Australian people wish—that he will change this clause again and again if he finds that it will so better suit the wishes of the Australian people. That we understand and appreciate, but that is another reason for delay. We do not know what the feeling of the Australian people is. The whole of the arguments appear to me to be in favour of some further delay—a short delay it may be—not only for our convenience, that we may prepare speeches and elaborate arguments, and for the dignity and propriety of the proceedings of this House, but for the sake of our making a good job of this matter when we undertake it. If we claim to be desirous of doing what the Australian people wish, we ought, first of all, to know what they desire. For all these reasons a short delay would not appear to be out of the question, and I am rather surprised that the Government have not themselves proposed it. On the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman was almost severe in his declaration of the great gravity and responsibility which would rest upon us if we invited this delay, and consequently I hesitate to put what is my strong opinion into the form of an actual request.

*MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I certainly do not desire to say a word in disparagement of the skill and patience shown by the right hon. Gentleman in managing the delicate negotiations in reference to this Bill, but I think the whole drift of the debate to-night has been in favour of delay, and there does not seem to be very much weight in the arguments used by the right hon. Gentleman against delay. The right hon. Gentleman has said he wanted to do all he could to meet the wishes of the Australian delegates. But what difference would a short delay make, seeing that it is in order to ascertain the opinion of those speaking for Australia? I am quite sure that after such a delay the debate on the Bill could be concluded in half an hour. Everybody in England is only too anxious that this Bill should be passed and to do anything to promote the happiness and prosperity of the people in Australia. When it was first brought forward it was with every prospect of it being passed, and, considering the splendid spirit shown by the colonists in South Africa, the people in this country should have been only too ready to show their appreciation. The Australian delegates came over boasting, as they had a right to boast, that they were the representatives of the people and Parliaments of Australia—of all the constituted authorities of Australia. Every one of them agreed as to the Bill that it ought to be passed by the House. The Colonial Secretary took up a position of complete antagonism to the measure. It was a matter for regret that the Colonial Secretary, instead of accepting the opinions of the constituted authorities of Australia, had endeavoured to obtain an opinion in Australia in favour of himself. He had adopted all the arts peculiar to the political agitator. We were told that this was the one last link in the Imperial union of the whole Empire—that it was the first step towards Imperial Federation. Anyone who had given any serious thought to the question of Imperial federation among the scattered members of the Empire of Great Britain must know that it is a perfect chimera, and that there is no colony in the Empire which to-morrow would accept the authority of any federated Assembly sitting in London to impose on them any control or any taxation whatever. The great aim of the people of Australia has been to break away from the last vestige and relic of the ill-omened domination of Downing Street in our Colonial Empire.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. Member that the discussion is limited to the Amendment before the Committee.

*MR. MACLEAN: Perhaps I may be permitted to point out why the Australian delegates protested against the scheme of Her Majesty's Government, however it might be modified. It was that they did not think it was one suited to the genius of the Australian people, and they used those eloquent and manly words which I think are strictly appropriate—

"The delegates reflect with pride that there are sentiments which will constitute eternal 'links of empire,' but are quite unable to understand how there can ever be the least hope that we can merely by insuring uniform interpretation of the law throughout the Empire, facilitate that unity of action for the common interests which will lead to a real federation of the Empire. The 'unity of action' and the uniform 'interpretation of the law' seem to them wholly unrelated and certain to remain so. The consciousness of kinship, the consciousness of common blood, and a consciousness of duty, the pride of their race and history, these are the links of empire, bonds which attach, not bonds which chafe."

These are the sentiments which have inspired the people of Australia, and I think we may rely more upon them, and feel that in the moment of emergency or danger the Australians will come to our side animated by the common sentiments of race, religion and language, by common sympathies, and by common traditions.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I should not oppose a motion for the adjournment proposed from the opposite side with the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. I confess that, although he does not venture to make the request, I have a difficulty in distinguishing between a formal request and the language in which he conveyed his opinion on the matter.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I was frightened out of it by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I was not aware I was so terrible in your opinion. I understand it is the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman that we should not proceed further, although I very much regret that it should be his opinion. I do not feel justified in offering any opposition to reporting progress, and in that case I would suggest that we continue the discussion on Thursday next.

Committee report Progress, to sit again upon Thursday.

Order for Third Reading Read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

SIR CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton), who was very distinctly heard in the Reporters' Gallery, was understood to explain that the object of the motion standing on the Paper in his name was to remove a very great defect in the Bill, and to make the measure a real and substantial advance in regard to the remedying of a grievance which had been recognised in the assessment of ecclesiastical buildings in Scotland. During the discussion at the Second Reading stage it was shown that the Bill was as badly drafted as could possibly be conceived, but the measure was read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee. That Standing Committee sat for only a single day, and was very sparsely attended. Although the Bill required certain amendments in matters of detail in order to explain what it really meant, and although various Amendments were moved by supporters of the Government with the object of making the measure more clear, the Lord Advocate, acting upon a very obvious system of Parliamentary tactics, refused to amend a single word of the Bill, the measure being reported without amendment to the House, thus escaping a discussion on Report. The hon. Member disclaimed any attempt to recommit the Bill for the purpose of making minor or verbal Amendments, but he desired its recommittal for the insertion of an Amendment which would have the effect of making the new power proposed in the Bill a reality instead of a sham. He was not alone in this desire, as no fewer than four Members of the Standing Committee, three of whom were supporters of the Government, had Amendments to the same effect before the Committee, but on a division were defeated, although of the Scotch Members present there were a majority in favour of the alteration. The clause he desired to have inserted was really the handiwork of the hon. Member for Glasgow University, who brought this Bill in many years ago as embodying the wish of the Church of Scotland in the matter, and the Bill then contained this very clause word for word. He therefore hoped to have the hon. Member's support to the proposal that the Bill be recommitted in respect of a new clause, which motion he now begged to move.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): I rise for the purpose of seconding the motion. Although I am one of those who vote in favour of the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of Scotland, yet I am one of those who are always prepared favourably to consider any proposal for the removal of any real grievance of the Church so long as that State connection exists. With regard to this Bill, I am surprised that the Church has brought in a Bill which introduces a principle entirely antagonistic to the principle of justice for which the Church has all along contended. In the first place, it has been strongly objected to that the feuars should be called upon to pay any part whatever of the expense of providing church accommodation and of the manse for the clergyman. I cannot conceive any reason of principle why these feuars of £50 a year should be exempted from the obligation attaching to the land of paying their proportion for the church accommodation in the parish. The parish church has to be erected for the accommodation of the parishioners whoever they may be, and if the population increases owing to the building of parishioners in the parish the parish church has to be correspondingly enlarged. The parish churches in Scotland have to be made sufficient in size to accommodate the parishioners without regard to dissent in the parish. Therefore, when you are dealing with the building of a parish church, you are dealing with a church which the law prescribes should be built in every parish for the accommodation of every parishioner in that parish. Obviously, therefore, what can be more just and reasonable, when the population of a parish increases, than that those persons for whose benefit public accommodation is required to be provided should bear their proportionate share of the cost of providing that accommodation? It is no argument to say that the feuars do not use the accommodation. If a public park is provided, it is no answer to say, "I do not go to the public park, and therefore should not be assessed." The park is provided for you whether you use it or not. In the same way, the parish church, be it right or be it wrong, is provided for you whether you go or not. This burden is one of the obligations on the land, and it is a just burden so long as we recognise the present system of State establishment and the obligation of the State to provide accommodation in the parish church whether the parishioners attend or not. That being so, why is this Bill brought in? It is not because the present law is unjust in principle. The law is perfectly just in principle, assuming the State connection to exist. The Bill is brought in because a great grievance has been alleged on the part of dissenters. They say, "We are providing church accommodation for ourselves, and why should we have to help provide for the parish church?" The same answer could be made by a man who sends his children to a private school. Why should he pay rates for the public schools? The reply to that argument is simply "There is the church and there is the accommodation provided for you. If you do not make use of that accommodation, or if you provide for private worship for yourselves, that is a matter for your own concern." The moment you deviate from that principle you get into difficulty so far as the Church is concerned. If it is not just that the dissenter should provide his fair share of the accommodation in the parish church, it is equally not just that he should have to pay any part of the minister's stipend in respect of the public worship in that church. Once you deviate from a principle of this kind you cannot stop. The Government have always maintained the justice of the principle of this assessment, and until you are able to deal with the subject comprehensively, and abolish the rate altogether, levying the burden of providing parish church accommodation in some other way, it would be much better to leave the incidence of taxation as it stands at present. What is the principle here as regards the first clause of the Bill? As the law stands at present the valuation is made upon the real rent. But there is an old valuation which has been in operation in some parishes which the House of Lords has decided not to be legally enforceable. According to a decision of the House of Lords about eighty years ago, the assessment must be based upon the real rent of the parish. The result is that every man will pay according to the valuation of his house, according to whatever is his value in the parish. That is the present law. At one time there was an old valuation in the parish; that is to say, 200 or 300 years ago the proprietor of land in a parish got his valuation fixed. But obviously such a valuation has no relation to the existing value of his land. Suppose since then minerals have been found in the land. A man who stands perhaps at a valuation of £300 a year may at present be drawing a revenue of £60,000 a year from that land, and yet be assessed at only the valued rent as it was made 200 or 300 years ago, and which has no relation whatever to the existing value. The result of this proposal will be that the men with the large incomes in the parish will be paying very small sums. That will be the effect of this provision in many parishes. No hon. Member would dare to propose in this House to make the old valuation compulsory. I do not believe the Lord Advocate would bring in such a measure, and if he did I do not think a single hon. Member on the opposite side would support him. This Parliament would never declare that it would take as the basis of an assessment the valuation fixed 200 or 300 years ago. The proposal of this Bill is that two-thirds in value may impose upon the other one-third this most unjust valuation. It is unjust that any majority should have it in their power to enforce upon a minority a system of valuation which neither this House nor any Parliament in the world would ever think of imposing. In every instance where you attempt to carry out this clause you will be creating an absolute injustice, because you are giving a majority the power to do that which this House would not itself authorise to be done. With regard to the rent, a statement is to be made about the amount that has to be paid, and the man who is exempted according to this section is not to be allowed to vote in any proceedings connected with the Church. How will you be in a position to ascertain the cost until you have had a meeting to vote upon the plans? This is where the Amendment comes in with great force. The men may be disfranchised at the last moment, but in the meantime how are you to know whether they will be contributors or not unless you have some obligation and guarantee that the money is to be forthcoming? You cannot exclude men from any participation in the voting on the plans, when it will not be known until the very end whether the Kirk

Session is to pay this money or not. Look at the position the Church would be placed in. If you have one parish where the money is not contributed by a Kirk Session, there you have a distinct grievance which would be felt as a statutory grievance, because although it is optional for the Kirk Session in the Bill to subscribe the money, yet it is a fair indication of the mind of Parliament that it is the duty of the Kirk Session to find the money, and if one Session does not find the money you create the grounds for an uproar in that parish. Is it not in the interests of the Church, if we are to acknowledge the principle of the Kirk Session contributing any share, that it should be fixed definitely, so that the money provided under the clause in every parish will be put on the same footing, and the possibility will not arise in future of one parish having a Kirk Session which pays, and another which does not pay, with the result that this grievance is ten times worse than under the existing state of the law? The amount is said to be £50. What reason is there for drawing the line at £50, and why should it not be £60 or £100? It is also provided that there shall be no assessment upon the buildings of any religious body. That system has gone on for many years, and there is a good deal of reason for maintaining it. If you have a church belonging to a dissenting body it can be sold to-morrow. The burden is attached to that church of paying its share for the taxation of the parish, and there is nothing wrong in principle in a matter of that kind. But it is different when dealing with the case of the parish church itself, because that church is in the same position as the poor-house. You do not assess the poor-house for Poor Law purposes, because it is the institution which is being supported. You do not charge the paupers with poor rates because they are paupers, and a parish church is in quite a different position from the dissenting church, because it is the object and not the subject of taxation. In the case of dissenting churches it is private property, which may increase in value and which may be sold. On the question of principle I do not see any reason for this exemption. I admit it is done for the purpose of endeavouring to remove a grievance, but when you deviate from a principle in removing a grievance you will find that you land yourself into worse confusion. The moment you deviate from the principle you are carried away to any extent, and I think it is a pity that the Church, if they intend to deal with this question, should not have dealt with it in the more modified degree mentioned by my hon. friend, and which is the object of this Amendment. The payment of this money should be made compulsory on the part of the Kirk Session. If you did that you would have a good reason for excluding people from participation in the voting. I do not see how it is possible without this new clause to go on excluding in this way. I think the Church, in its own interest, has not been well advised in raising this question in this perfunctory manner. The dissenting churches of Scotland not only provide their own churches and manse, but they provide about £1,500,000 a year for their religious teachings. When you consider that the Church of Scotland, which claims to contain the wealthiest portion of the community, only contributes £500,000 a year for all purposes, and when it is borne in mind that the Church of Scotland gets its ministers' stipends paid for out of the teinds, surely it is not too much to say that they should also pay to provide comfortable habitations in which to go to worship. If the principle is just that these small heritors should pay, it ought to be made compulsory, and if it is not just they should be excluded. I beg to second my hon. friend's proposition.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the words 'now read the third time,' and add the words 're-committed in respect of a New Clause'."—(Sir Charles Cameron)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'now read the third time' stand part of the Question."

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL* (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): I think the hon. Member for Mid Lanarkshire has gone very wide afield in seconding this motion. He has conjured up a very formidable list of dangers and difficulties that will happen if this Bill is passed. They are mostly imaginary, and in so far as they are not imaginary I do not think it is beyond the wit of man to find some way of avoiding them. I may remark, however, that there was much in what the hon. Member said about the question of assessments which I would commend to the notice of my hon. friend whose motion he seconded. With regard to the motion of the hon. Member for Bridgeton, the hon. Member claims my support because he says the same clause was contained in a Bill in 1884, which I had the honour of introducing. I am not ashamed of that clause in its original position. I think it was a good clause in the Bill of 1884. But we are now no longer concerned with that Bill, for we have another Bill before us which contains a provision which makes the clause unnecessary. The object of the clause was to give security that the promoters of the work for which an assessment was to be imposed would produce funds to replace the sums lost to the assessment by the exemptions or deductions due to the operation of the Bill. The Bill made certain exemptions or deductions from assessment in favour of certain heritors, called feuars. In order that no additional burden be thereby imposed on the other heritors the deficiency in the product of the assessment caused by these exemptions must be found otherwise, and the clause proposed that a bond of security should be given by persons of satisfactory standing that this money should be forthcoming. That is the clause which my hon. friend proposes to add to this Bill. It was necessary in the Bill of 1884, but the present Bill provides that the money must have been actually raised and paid by the Kirk Session to the collector of the assessment. In other words, instead of asking for security, it requires a cash payment. There is therefore no longer any need for the clause. The question has been asked, why continue the burden upon land of maintaining the church and manse buildings? The question should rather be, why should land be relieved of this burden? Estates in Scotland for generations past have been subject to it, have changed hands under it, and have come into the possession of the present owners with this burden upon them. Purchasers have paid so much the less for their estates because of this burden. I would ask our friends on the Opposition side do they propose to make the landlords of Scotland a present of £42,000 a year? That is the sum which the burden was found to amount to, some years ago. The heritors of Scotland as a body do not complain of the burden, and never have done so. It is only a section of their number, the small feuars, who have complained. Their position is somewhat peculiar. They hold that for many years it was not understood that they were liable to any share of this burden. For fifty years after the law was declared it never was put in force, because there was no valuation roll to enable the assessors to get at the value of the feuars' properties, and when the Valuation Act was passed in 1854 and it was made possible to reach the feuars, they not unnaturally felt that they had a certain grievance when an assessment of this kind was levied upon them. The Church now wishes to relieve the small feuars, but in such a way as not to impose any additional burden upon the other heritors. Such is the reason for this Bill. The Bill is applicable to the original parishes only—some 900 out of 1,350. As regards parishes with a large urban element, in which any assessment if imposed would be on the real rent, and in which the number of heritors, including feuars, would be very great, I believe the practice, when outlay on church building is required, will increasingly be to have no assessment whatever, but to raise the money wholly by voluntary subscription—as has recently been done in the instances of St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh; Barony, Glasgow; and Abbey, Paisley. But that is not inconsistent with retaining the obligation of heritors for such assessments. Even when the money is raised by subscription individual heritors are found as a rule to contribute willingly, recognising their obligation as heritors although it is not enforced by an assessment. But cases will occur when recourse to assessment is necessary, and this Bill will make it possible to carry it out without such friction as has been caused in too many instances in the past.

 Sir Charles Cameron and
 Mr. Caldwell.

Main Question again proposed.

MR. BIRRELL (Fifeshire, W.): I con-dole with the Lord Advocate, who is a man of virile intelligence, on having to take charge and pass through the House this measure, which even those who sit behind him regard as the smallest bantling ever introduced into this House even by a Minister of the Crown. It is the smallest and most pedantic measure ever seen, a microscopic measure of the poorest description. You might describe it in Shakespearean language as "the baby of a girl." The hon. Gentleman referred to the fact that from time immemorial there has been this charge upon the land of Scotland, and it is news to me to be told that any Scotchman who has acquired a portion of soil of his country should wish to be relieved of the burden of the maintenance of the fabrics of the Established Church, except, indeed, upon fair terms—namely, that the burden should be put upon the shoulders of those who derive advantage from them. That is a fair and reasonable solution, but why the existing state of things should be altered as it is to be altered by this Bill, simply because a number of feuars hold a small portion of soil, I am at a loss to understand. We are told there is a grievance, but it is not a grievance which has ever pressed itself upon my attention, at any rate. When I was in Scotland I never heard that the small feuars of the county of Fife had a burden more unbearable than that of anyone else as to the payments of local charges. It is not a thing to be disclaimed, and the small feuair should not be allowed in this House to disclaim it. It was on account of the existence of this charge that he obtained his land cheaper than he otherwise would. No doubt there is some misapprehension on this question in Scotland; the small feuair thought he was absolved from this burden, but it is now a long time since the obscure part of the law was made clear. The small feuair and the large landowner are both charged, but the way in which this Bill deals with the charge is highly characteristic of modern legislation. The small feuair is to be absolved from this burden on terms; that is to say, if the Kirk Session, by means of a bazaar or charitable contributions, is able to make good the deficiency, this Bill is to come into operation; but, unless the funds are forthcoming, the obligation remains. I think it is the first time in the history of Parliament that a person has been relieved of a burden in such a manner. This Bill is a very contemptible measure, and I think it is only fair to draw attention to this fact, that the small feuair is to be relieved of a burden which has been borne from time immemorial, if any persons in Scotland—good, bad, or indifferent—are prepared to make good the deficiency out of their own pockets. I see no reason why the land should be relieved from a burden which it took in exchange for something very valuable. It has got off uncommonly easily from its other obligations, with regard particularly to education. However that may be, from time immemorial the land in Scotland has borne this burden, and if the question is to be dealt with at all it should be dealt with on a bolder and more honourable principle.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I think the hon. Member for West Fife has scarcely appreciated the object of this Bill, and his comments have been characterised by the same fault which ran through the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Lanark, who dealt with the technical points of the measure. The hon. Member for Mid Lanark complained, as the hon. Member who has just sat down complained, that feuars should be exempted from a burden which now falls upon them, and which has always been on the land in Scotland. But the hon. Members seem to forget that this burden did not always press upon the feuars, because they are a newly created class. It is really out of the question to say, as the hon. Member for Mid Lanark says, that every feuair has a right to a seat in the parish church. That is a legal fiction. St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, is a good illustration. Why, if the hon. Gentleman's argument were enforced the Waverley Market would not be nearly big enough. If the hon. Member for Mid Lanark had devoted his gifts to the ministry and had been minister of the church of St. Cuthbert's the ears of the greedy parishioners would have been open in vain to the voice of my hon. friend. The hon. Member went on to say that he objected to the clause in the Bill which exempts the churches of other denominations, and he asked why they should not pay. "Why do you not," he asked, "charge poor rates on paupers?" "Because," he said, "paupers are the objects and not the subjects of the poor rates." When he said that I could not but remember a proverb with which, no doubt, he is familiar. "You can't take the breeks off a Highlandman," because he does not happen to possess them. That is why you do not levy poor rates on paupers. This Bill is not meant to do any more than permissibly allow the people to obviate a grievance which practically creates friction. The hon. Member for West Fife says it has never been brought to his notice that the feuars there object to bearing their burden. There is a simple reason for that. In the Division of West Fife, which he represents, the parishes are almost entirely and purely landward, and of course it is not in such places that opposition can emerge. It is in parishes which are not purely landward, parishes which are partly landward and partly burghal, and where there are large populous places, that the real difficulty arises. I hope the House will give this measure a Third Reading. I am content to allow the people of Scotland to decide as to whether the epithets of the Member for West Fife are deserved. We can well afford to wait for the measures he will introduce when he gets a well-deserved seat on this bench. But this Bill will as a matter of fact remove what has been an unfortunate cause of friction in the past, and stimulate the Church to greater activity in Scotland.

*MR. HALDANE (Haddingtonshire): I stand before the House as a valued heritor threatened with ecclesiastical assessment for the building of a new church. I want to remove this controversy from the air of abstraction hitherto attending it, and to present to the House the spectacle of my own grievance, if it is possible to get the House to listen. I am sure I shall succeed when I relate my tale. I live, in those times of the year when I am not compulsorily drawn to attend the sittings of this House, near a town where there is a parish church which for years has amply satisfied all my spiritual requirements. We have recently called a new minister. Little did we know what that would entail upon us. He says the sitting room is insufficient and that the fabric must be repaired. Under the law of Scotland as it stands at the present time he is in a position to call upon the heritors, and not only the valued heritors, to deal with the case. In that town there are a large number of people called feuars. The feuars of Auchterarder are a robust body. Their ancestors were out in the '45, and shed their blood in those days. Later on they brought about the Disruption.

Mr. A. Graham Murray.

As they attend the parish church much more frequently than it is possible for me to do, they are naturally the persons who, under a reasonable construction of the law, should meet this assessment. But how will things stand if this Bill passes? Why, the heritors will be the persons who will be primarily liable to the incidence of this tax, because if the Bill means anything it means that some relief is to be given to the feuars. The feuars of Auchterarder are not people who are excessively attached to the doctrines and associations of the present Government. They have, some of them, been very much opposed to the Established Church since the Disruption, and, as far as I can conceive the motive and purpose with which this Bill is introduced, it is merely to reconcile the feuars of Auchterarder and many similar places to a continuance of the principle of Establishment. What is this Bill brought in for? To remedy any grievance? No. It is like a number of other Bills brought before the House by the Government to redeem pledges given by private Members. For another example, there is the extension of the Compensation Act to farm servants. Without any manifestation of a desire that they should bring in this ecclesiastical assessments measure the Government at the last moment, when it is comparatively far on in its life, brings it in, I presume, with the object of being able to say to the people of Scotland that they have done something substantial for the Establishment. I am advised by experts on the spot that if this Bill passes it will not have the slightest effect on the minds of the people of Auchterarder. There is not the smallest probability that any contribution will be got out of the valued-rent heritors which they are not required to pay at the present time. I am glad to see from the first clause of the Bill that it cannot come into operation except with the consent of a two-thirds majority in value. The clause states that—

“It shall be lawful for any valued-rent heritor to request the clerk to the heritors to summon a meeting of valued-rent heritors in the manner prescribed by Section 22 of the Ecclesiastical Buildings and Glebes (Scotland) Act; and if at such meeting it is resolved by a majority of not less than two-thirds in value of valued-rent heritors, voting personally or by proxy, that the amount shall be imposed according to valued rent, then such assessment shall be imposed according to the valued rent, any law to the contrary notwithstanding."

That gives me some confidence that the Government does not really mean that this is a serious measure. Why should hon. Members opposite in this House who have no interest in Scotch ecclesiastical matters be tormented with a Bill which can effect no practical change in the position as it is at the present moment?

*SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire): The hon. and learned Member for Haddington says that there is no possible grievance to be remedied. I utterly deny that proposition. In the year 1887 I had the honour to back a Bill brought in by my right hon. friend the Member for Edinburgh University, and I myself brought in a Bill in a subsequent year, very much of the same character as this one. A question very commonly asked at the last General Election was "Why cannot you do something in the direction of relieving the feuars of this burden?" It has been invariably the Liberal party who has opposed this kind of legislation, while the Conservatives have always been quite willing to remedy the present state of things. The hon. and learned Member for West Fife says that this is a microscopic Bill to deal with a microscopic grievance. It may be a small Bill and a small grievance, but there is such a thing as a sentimental grievance which is more hardly felt than a real big one. I have never been personally annoyed as a valued-rent heritor by the payment of the rate on valued rent, and I believe that most of the valued-rent heritors are willing and ready to pay their full quota of the rates. I heartily thank the Government for bringing in this Bill, and I hope it will be passed to-night.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Mr. Haldane and Mr.
 Birrell.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

LAND CHARGES BILL [Lords].

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill, as amended (by the Standing Committee), be now considered."

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) said that this was a Bill of a most complicated character, relating entirely to England. It was to be regretted that the Government had not, when introducing a measure of this kind, availed themselves of the opportunity of practically consolidating the whole law on the subject. That could have been done in a very simple manner. As the Bill stood at the present moment it was impossible to consider the effect of it without going consecutively through the whole of the statutes from the Judgments Act of 1838, which were more or less repealed by the Schedule. So far as the operative effect of a judgment as a charge upon land was concerned, that was contained in Section 13 of the Act of 1838, but that section had no relation to the law as it at present stood. All that was necessary to simplify the law was to recast practically the sections of the Act of 1838 which were still operative, and adapt them to the existing state of the law. If that had been done and another clause added dealing with lites pendens, they would have had the whole of the law relating to judgments as charges on land in one Bill. As it was the matter was left in so complicated a state that it would be very difficult indeed for any ordinary practitioner to know what the law really was. Then, the law was not to come into operation for a year, which would prevent consolidation for some time. He hoped that some attempt would be made, at no distant date, to consolidate the law and put it into a simpler form.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. CALDWELL, in moving the Amendment standing in his name, said it was stated that the business of the Registrar of Judgments was to be transferred to the Land Registry, and power was given to the Lord Chancellor, by order, to arrange for the abolition of the office of Registrar of Judgments. It did seem strange to provide for the transfer of an office and then for its abolition. It seemed to him that there was no very clear reason for abolishing the office, for it would have to remain for certain purposes connected with the registration of lites pendens. Again, the Bill was not to affect the Register of Scotch and Irish judgments. He merely formally moved his Amendment to enable the Attorney General to give an expression of opinion on the subject.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 12, to leave out from the word 'transfer,' to the end of Sub-section 1, of Clause 1."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs) desired to acknowledge the spirit which the hon. Member had shown on this subject, in which he had taken a great interest, and in connection with which he had had the opportunity of conferring with him. He hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment. The office itself was not to be transferred to the Land Registry, but the business of the office. The registration of lites pendens would also go to the Land Registry, subject to the rules in the Statute Book. The abolition of the office of the Registrar of Judgments would in no way affect the registration of Scotch or Irish judgments. As to the abolition of the office, if the Lord Chancellor found that it was necessary that the office should still continue to exist, the power of abolition placed in his hands would not be exercised without careful consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I hope the House will now assent to the Third Reading of the Bill.

MR. CALDWELL: I do not object to the Third Reading being now taken, but I hope the Attorney General will give us some information on the subject of consolidation.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I am sure the House will realise that there are many difficulties connected with the question of consolidation, but I hope in a subsequent session to have the assistance of the hon. Gentleman in endeavouring to pass a measure of that kind.

Bill read the third time, and passed, with Amendments.

BURIAL GROUNDS BILL.

As amended (by the Standing Committee), considered.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): The Amendment which I now move was moved in the Standing Committee on Law, and was opposed by the Home Secretary, not because it was objectionable in itself, but because it was unnecessary. The right hon. Gentleman must, however, have been unaware, or forgetful, of certain facts which would have modified his views, and I therefore wish to submit those facts to the House. I have also a further object in view in moving this Amendment, and that is to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman in this House an important statement he made in the Standing Committee in regard to one aspect of this Bill. This Amendment relates to the allotment of ground to religious denominations in public cemeteries, and it is necessary to inform the House how this system has originated and how it has been worked. One of the Burial Acts provides that every burial ground shall be divided into consecrated and unconsecrated parts, and that the unconsecrated part shall be allotted in such a manner and in such portions as may be sanctioned by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. When a witness from the Home Office appeared before the Standing Committee he was questioned upon this subject, and what was his admission? That the section to which I have just referred does not in any way explain what allotments are referred to, and that it was only "a sort of guess one had to make" that it was intended to be allotments to different sects. Yet on the strength of a mere guess the Home Office has created a system of denominational allotment, and has determined the mode in which that system must be administered. Up to 1897 allotments had been made in eighty-nine cemeteries and in all but nine to Roman Catholics, in other cases to "Roman Catholics or strangers," and in only one case to Jews. While it is admitted on the part of the Home Office that there is no decision on the point, it is the Home Office view that those to whom the allotments have been made have exclusive and absolute control over them. There has been a great deal of difficulty in certain cases. In the case of King's Lynn, a cemetery was provided by the town council many years ago and a small portion was allotted to the use of Roman Catholics, but nothing was said about its exclusive use by members of that body. For several years no difficulty arose, but in 1892 it was desired to bury in a family grave in the Roman Catholic portion one who had been a Roman Catholic, but who had become a Protestant. It was desired that the deceased should be buried by the Baptist minister, and the desire was fulfilled. The Roman Catholic authorities complained of the invasion of their rights, and very unseemly scenes followed. The town council felt that they had no power to prevent the Baptist minister officiating on the occasion. The Home Office was appealed to, and they replied that when once an allotment was made on behalf of any body that portion must be reserved for the exclusive use of that body, and that it was the duty of the burial authority to resist any invasion of that right. Thereupon the Town Council very respectfully expressed dissent from the Home Office view, and asked whether the police were justified in interfering in order to prevent the alleged invasion of rights. At that point the Home Office faltered, and replied that they could not undertake to give advice, but would leave the local authority to act in accordance with their own discretion. Another case subsequently arose in the same cemetery. It was a case of a convert from Roman Catholicism to Protestantism, and the wish of the deceased was to be buried with her children in the family grave. Another case is now pending at Barnstaple. A burial service was performed in the ground allotted to Roman Catholics by a Church of England clergyman; whereupon Father Byrne protested to the burial board, and the board refused to recognise the right, or rather the exclusive right, of Roman Catholics in the ground. The Roman Catholics appealed to the Home Secretary, and a reply has been received that in the opinion of the Home Office no other service can be held on the ground allotted to Roman Catholics, and the burial board has been called upon to comply with the requirements of the law. The argument of the burial board is that this is not a requirement of the law, but simply of the Home Office. There are several objections in my opinion to the entire system of allotments to religious bodies in cemeteries. It seems to me most unreasonable that when all the inhabitants of the parish defrayed the cost—sometimes the very heavy cost—of a public cemetery, one religious denomination should claim to have a sole and exclusive right to use a portion of the ground. Those who wish for separation in burial should, I think, be obliged to make separate provision for themselves. I see no reason whatever why members of the Roman Catholic Church should possess a privilege, or right, which has been distinctly taken away from the members of the Church of England. If that were unreasonable at the outset of this system, since the passing of the Burial Act of 1880 it appears to be absolutely preposterous. That Act affirmed the principle that there should be no distinction between consecrated and unconsecrated ground in either churchyards or cemeteries, but that orderly and Christian services might be performed anywhere, under certain provisions. But this allotment system is practically an invasion of the Act of 1880, because it continues, for the benefit of particular classes of the community, the restrictive rights which were abolished by the legislature. I wish to emphasise the fact that this has been done, not by statutory authority, but has been solely the action of the Home Office. No doubt the Home Office thought they were justified in adopting that course in past times, but now that the Act of 1880 has affected such a great change in our burial system I submit that this system of allotment is quite out of harmony with modern legislation, and that it requires to be regularised, if not abolished. The answer of the Home Office to my contention is that this Amendment is not necessary, and that all that it seeks is provided for by the existing law. My reply is that the action of the Home Office is not compatible with the provisions of this Amendment, which affirms a principle that in my opinion the Home Office has distinctly violated. The practical importance of this question has been very much increased by what transpired in the Standing Committee. Some of the facts which I have described were brought out in evidence, and the question arose as to whether members of the Church of England could not also have the benefit of this allotment system, and on the Home Office witness being asked the question he replied, "In accordance with the strict words of the Act I do not see why not, because the Act is so extremely vague." Then he was asked whether, if allotments were granted to the Church of England it would not be an entire departure from the Act of 1880, and he replied that that was the Home Office view, if an allotment could be given to the Church at all. If the Home Office view were translated into action on the part of many members of the Church of England, it would be a practical abrogation of the Act of 1880, which required years of agitation and bitter feeling to place on the Statute Book. I hope the House will feel that the present state of the law is most unsatisfactory, and that, if the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary does not see his way to abolish this system of allotment, he will strengthen the hands of the local authorities, in order that they may be able to resist the unjust and, as I think, the unfounded claim of religious denominations to whom portions of the cemeteries may have been allotted. The right hon. Gentleman in dealing with this question in the Standing Committee gave the assurance that there was no intention on the part of the Home Office to strain the allotment system, so that portions of cemeteries might be allotted to the exclusive use of the Church of England. That is a very satisfactory explanation so far as it goes. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Home Secretary has not stated a single objection to the Amendment. His sole contention is that it is uncalled for, as the existing law is adequate. I submit that the facts I have stated show that the existing law requires amendment. The purpose to be served by this Amendment cannot be obtained until the law is altered. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman and the Government are anxious that this should be an efficacious measure and that they would regret if, in consequence of any defects or mistakes, the Bill renewed the strife which prevailed for so many years. If the Amendment be unnecessary, it will be on the showing of the Home Secretary himself harmless. I hope, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to remove all apprehension on the point, by consenting to the insertion of these words. I beg to move, Sir.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, line 11, after the word 'board,' to insert the words, 'Provided that where any portion of a burial ground is allotted under any Act for the use of any particular religious denomination, the freehold of the same shall remain vested in the burial authority, which shall have the same control over burials therein as in other parts of the burial ground, and the provisions of The Burial Laws Amendment Act, 1880, as amended by this Act, shall apply thereto.'—
(Mr. Carvell Williams.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): I think that the hon. Gentleman is unnecessarily alarmed both as to what has been the practice of the Home Office which he has so consistently attacked and as to what is the present law. As I said in the Standing Committee, this Amendment may mean something more than appears on the face of it, in which case it would be objectionable. But according to the present interpretation of the law it is unnecessary, because the freehold remains with the burial authorities, and nothing that this Bill does in any way disturbs the right of the burial authority over ground over which their jurisdiction extends, whether it has been allotted or not. The hon. Gentleman seems to think that the Home Office not only at the present time, but for years, has been straining the law. I can only say that everything which has been done by the Home Office has been consistently done, and in the opinion of the Law Officers has been in strict conformity with the statute.

When the hon. Gentleman asks for an assurance that there is no intention to allot to members of the Church of England, which he specially named, I can only say that if any application came from members of the Church of England for the allotment of unconsecrated ground—because by law the ground must be unconsecrated to be allotted—it would be for the Home Office to say whether under the law they must comply with the request or not. But hitherto, as the hon. Gentleman knows, members of the Church of England have desired to conduct their burials in consecrated ground and have never applied for allotments; nor, I am disposed to think, are they likely to apply. The Act of 1880 and its effect on the allotment system appear to be altogether misunderstood by the hon. Gentleman. The Act of 1880 was intended to get over certain ecclesiastical difficulties in consecrated ground, and also with reference to certain cases of church services in unconsecrated ground, and it is in no way affected by this Bill or by the operation of the allotment system. The general objection to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman is this—I maintain in the first place that it does not alter the law. It may or may not alter the law, but on the face of it—at all events the first part of it—it does not. In the second place, if it does it is in distinct contradiction to the recommendations of the Committee. That Committee was a very valuable one, and did more to settle this very difficult and controversial question about burials than any action which has been taken in the House of Commons for many years, and I should be sorry if a point such as this were now reopened. The question of the allotment system was considered by the Committee, and one of their recommendations was that the system of allotment under the Burials Act should be continued. They obviously did not desire to enlarge upon the question of allotment at all, and I do think that, while I am as anxious as the hon. Gentleman that this Bill should put an end to some of the more difficult and controversial questions, it would be much better—I say it with confidence—to carry out in their entirety the recommendations of the Committee and to leave the allotment system where it is. I hope, therefore, the hon. Gentleman will not press the Amendment.

Sir M. White Ridley.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan): First of all I must express my great regret that the hon. Gentleman who often claims the dignified position of peacemaker should on this occasion endeavour to foment strife. The proceedings of the Select Committee were conducted from first to last in a spirit of friendship and compromise, and I cannot see in the records of that Committee any motion made by the hon. Gentleman in the sense of his motion this evening. He seems to have been influenced at that time by the spirit of peace and goodwill which prevailed on the Committee, and I regret that a different spirit actuates him to-night. I should not have ventured to take part in this debate if it were not for the circumstance that my Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen in Lancashire are greatly affected by these proposals. In Liverpool there is an allotment for Roman Catholics, and the evidence given before the Committee was as follows—

“A portion of land was set apart for the use of Roman Catholics, so that the members of that body might be interred together, and it is the intention of the local authority to give this exclusively to Roman Catholics.”

That privilege has been long enjoyed by Roman Catholics. I believe it is greatly valued by them, and why should it be taken away? In Wigan, the borough I have the honour to represent, the Roman Catholics have had an allotment for forty-five years, and that allotment they have enjoyed in peace and contentment without any disturbance or friction or difficulty. Why does the hon. Gentleman representing the Nonconformists endeavour to interfere with the harmony which has so long prevailed? Not only in Wigan, but in the adjoining townships, the same system exists with the same satisfactory results and the same absence of strife. Am I not justified, therefore, in complaining of the language of the hon. Gentleman? He talks of concord and peace, but his language is not the language of peace, and his words are not the words of concord. I will oppose the Amendment on the ground that it promotes neither peace, concord, nor Christian love.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: I may say I raised the point in Committee, and divided the Committee on it.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester): I am surprised at the extraordinary and misleading speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigan. He has been attacking an entirely imaginary proposition. My hon. friend the Member for the Mansfield Division of Notts in his Amendment makes no attempt to remove these allotments, and he uttered no word whatever to justify the angry denunciations which I have never heard the hon. Baronet use before in such unmeasured terms. I am entirely at a loss to understand what should have excited him to such an extent. What my hon. friend proposes is that in case of an allotment of this kind the freehold should still remain the property of the burial authority, who should still continue to have some hold over the burial ceremony. If I understood the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary aright, this Amendment would practically not alter the law.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I believe not.

MR. BROADHURST: If that is so I would advise the House to accept the Amendment. The Home Secretary tells us in good faith that he believes it will not alter the law. He is stating what he believes to be the best of his knowledge and authority to be true. If that be so the proposition of my hon. friend practically coincides with the existing law, and the denunciation to which we have just listened should have been addressed to the Home Secretary and not to my hon. friend. I hope the hon. Baronet will ask the permission of the House to offer some apology for the attack he has just made on my hon. friend. So far as I am concerned I do not wish to interfere with the sentiment of any religious denomination, either with regard to the burial ceremony or the location of the interment. At the same time I do think that every progressive Christian man must recognise the elementary principle of Christianity which deprecates as far as it can, without causing unnecessary pain, separation after death. It is a lamentable state of things, to my mind, that any one religious section of the community should desire to have a separate allotment for the purposes of interment. I do not see what reasonable justification there is for it. But at the same time my hon. friend does not propose to interfere with it, although he regrets the existence of the sentiment. I thank the Home Secretary for the very nice manner in which he has met my hon. friend. He has made a very important statement, no doubt with full knowledge. I believe he is perfectly correct in stating that the main principle of this Amendment now exists in law, and I will therefore join with the Home Secretary in appealing to my hon. friend not to press his Amendment to division.

*MR. GODDARD (Ipswich): Listening to the impassioned language of the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigan, I feel profoundly glad he was not on the Committee which had under consideration this important Bill—as I doubt if we should have arrived at this compromise. The object of the Amendment has been misunderstood by the hon. Baronet. The Member for Mansfield rose in Committee when this question of allotments came up and moved certain modifications, in order to leave himself free to discuss the matter on the Third Reading. It is not open, therefore, for the hon. Member for Wigan to attack my hon. friend as he has done. His object was to obtain the re-assertion of the principle contained in the Amendment—namely—

“that where any portion of a burial ground is allotted under any Act for the use of any particular religious denomination, the freehold of the same shall remain vested in the burial authority.”

The Home Secretary has re-asserted that principle, and it was simply because my hon. friend thought it was not asserted sufficiently plainly that he put the Amendment on the Paper. He would have preferred if the Home Secretary had stated in the House as plainly as he stated in the Grand Committee his views in regard to allotments and the Church of England. He asserted that the Home Office did not wish to encourage the use of the allotments by the Church of England, nor to give its sanction to it.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: What I said was that it was the duty of the Home Office, when an application was made for an allotment, to see that the law was carried out.

*MR. GODDARD: I think he went so far in the Standing Committee as to say that the Home Office would not encourage the granting of allotments to the Established Church. That is really the object of the Amendment, and the principle having been re-asserted, I quite agree with the hon. Member for Leicester that this Amendment should not be pressed to a division.

SIR R. C. JEBB (Cambridge University): As I had the honour to be chairman of the Select Committee, I wish to bear my testimony to the fair spirit shown by the hon. Member for Mansfield. I venture to think, after what has fallen from my right hon. friend the Home Secretary, that the hon. Member for Mansfield might be content with having moved this Amendment.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockton): I also appeal to my hon. friend not to press this Amendment to a division. If he presses it I am afraid many of us on this side will vote against it. If a cemetery is constructed under the Act of 1853 consecration must follow as a matter of course, but in that case it has always been the practice of the burial authority to allot a portion of the burial ground to Roman Catholics, and to give them certain privileges, but it has never been understood that the freehold of that portion should be given with the allotment. I do not agree with the remark that this Bill settles the controversy, because under Clause 2 this Bill gives power to the Home Office to go behind the local authority, although the local authority has to provide the cost of making the cemetery. In every case now under this Bill consecration must follow. [AN HON. MEMBER: No.] Oh, yes it will. It is my reading of Clause 2 that consecration is bound to follow. I ask my hon. friend to withdraw the Amendment so that it may not be misconstrued.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: After the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman I ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: The object of the Amendment I now beg to move is to bring one portion of the Bill into harmony with another portion. One of the clauses provides that the existing fees shall continue to be levied for a certain period from the passing of this measure, whereas the final clause provides that the Act shall come into operation on 1st January next. I cannot imagine that any inconvenience will arise if the Act comes into operation as soon as it receives the Royal assent. Otherwise, for several months to come the burial authorities will be much embarrassed, in acting under a law which has only a few months to live. It would be better to adopt the date of the Act as the date when it will come into operation.

Another Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, line 25, to leave out the words 'first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and one,' and insert the words 'day of the passing thereof,' instead thereof."—
(Mr. Carvell Williams.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: In point of form, I think if the object of this Amendment is to be effected that the best way would be to leave out the sub-clause altogether. Then the Act would come into operation on receiving the Royal assent. But great inconvenience would be caused if this Act came into operation then. There is a great deal of work to be done by the Central Departments concerned, as well as by local authorities, immediately after the passing of the Act and before it comes into operation. I do not know that there is any example of a Bill which requires so many administrative preparations as this one being brought into effect before there is time to consider them. I hope the hon. Gentleman, after consideration, will not press the Amendment.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: I do not attach importance to this Amendment. I made it suggestively, and I have no wish to press it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

(RE-COMMITTED) BILL.

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

DEPOSITS) BILL [Lords].

[SECOND READING.]

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): The object of the Bill is that money which is obtained in certain cases may be invested in the Post Office Savings Banks. That is the procedure under the Act of 1897. If the money is not invested in some such way it is very apt to be squandered by those who get the control of the money. Under these circumstances this is a Bill deserving of attention, and I hope the House will be content to take the Second Reading.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

INEBRIATES AMENDMENT (SCOT-LAND) BILL [Lords].

[SECOND READING.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): This is a Bill to amend the Inebriates Act which was passed in 1898. I think it is always objectionable when we have a Bill introduced in one session that it should be necessary to proceed almost in the next session to amend it. It shows the necessity when a Bill is before the House of having it properly considered, so that it should not be necessary always to bring in these amending Bills. Indeed, a great many of the Government measures consist of Bills to amend the legislation of the two previous years. Under the Inebriates Act the funds for providing homes for inebriates are to be levied in the same way as the funds for reformatory schools are levied. These funds are provided under a rate called the prisons rate, so that in order to know what is levied under the Inebriates Act you have to get the Reformatory Schools Act, and when you have found that you have to ascertain how the prisons rate is levied. That rate, I think, in almost all cases is levied on the owners. This Bill proposes to change the rate to the public health rate, which in Scotland is levied half on owners and half on occupiers. I object altogether to the public rates being used for the purpose of providing homes for inebriates. We have precedents for providing money from other sources. As the House is aware, we take certain sums of money from the duties on spirits and licensing for the purpose of aiding local rates. I would suggest that in making provision for the homes for inebriates we ought to provide the funds out of the whisky duty or some other tax of that kind. It seems to me to be a fair principle that if the sale of whisky and other spirituous liquors, which, of course, is recognised in this country, produces an evil requiring a remedy in the shape of suitable inebriate homes, then that provision should be made a special burden on that article of excise which causes drunkenness and the necessity for these homes. That is why I have put down an Amendment for the rejection of the Bill. I have done so principally to raise the question as regards the change proposed—the levying of the tax in connection with public health. As compared with the existing law, certainly the Bill is an improvement. There is no question about that. I do not know why the ratepayers should be compelled to pay for the provision of such homes when many of them do not consume spirits at all. If the burden of providing inebriate homes is placed on the taxation of spirits, you will have a wealthy fund to draw upon, and I am sure there would be no objection whatever in the country. The other point to which I wish to refer is that a new offence has been created so as to bring the inebriates within the Act. I have always a strong objection to the creation of a new offence with the view of bringing it under any particular Act. The common law of Scotland and the licensing laws are strong enough for all practical purposes. Until the Inebriates Act was brought into operation I never heard any complaint as to the law. I do not know any special reason why this new offence should be created. We will hear an explanation from the Lord Advocate, but I hold that the support of an inebriates' home should be a burden on drink itself. I beg to move that the Second Reading be postponed for three months.

MR. PRICE (Norfolk, E.) seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): The hon. Member may rest assured that there is no intention here to create any new crime. The scheme of the Inebriates Act was to deal with offences of which drunkenness was the essence of the offence. As it happened, there were a great many offences under English law of which drunkenness was the essence of the offence, and consequently these offences were put in the schedule of the Bill. Persons who suffered conviction for these offences were liable to be put in an inebriates' home. But the law of Scotland was different. It was mostly common law and not statute law, as in England. There was this anomaly, that except in certain cities under Police Acts there were few places where drunkenness was the essence of the crime. If the Act were allowed to remain unamended it would be practically a dead letter in Scotland. The object of the Bill is to create a new offence in one sense, but it is an old offence in another sense. As regards the other matter, the rating clause, the hon. Member for Mid Lanark candidly confesses that he thinks it an improvement, but his objection is that this ought not to be a charge on the local rates at all, but on the Imperial funds. Whether the hon. Member is right or not I am not at the present moment going to discuss. It is perfectly evident that you could not expect that inebriates' homes should be made a charge on the Imperial funds in Scotland, while not so in England. The scheme of the Act of 1898 was that only criminal inebriates were to be dealt with in State inebriate reformatories; but if you come to the minor offences of drunk and disorderly when they are repeated more than a certain number of times within a certain period, then they are to be dealt with in inebriate homes provided by the local authority. That is the law in England, and you would scarcely expect that in Scotland they should be supported from the Imperial funds.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockton): I am afraid I cannot on this occasion follow my hon. friend into the lobby on the ground he has suggested. I quite agree with the Lord Advocate when he states that that would be an injustice to England. In a large number of places in England it has been decided not to put the Act in operation, but where they do put it in operation it must be a charge on the county funds and not a charge on the Imperial Exchequer. I regard that as a very proper manner in which to raise funds for the cost of inebriate homes, for this reason: if you bring home to the people the enormity of excessive drinking you will have better administration under the Licensing Act, and they will put the law in operation to a greater extent to prevent drunkenness than has been done in the past. I must say I am surprised that the hon. Member for Mid Lanark, who takes such a keen interest in most of these questions, should suggest on this occasion that the charge should be an Imperial one.

It being Midnight, the debate stood adjourned.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of all sums payable by the Postmaster General under any Act of the present Session to enable Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire Lands for the Public Service, and of all expenses incurred in carrying into effect the Provisions of such Act."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again"—(Mr. Caldwell)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

EXECUTORS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Read a second time, and committed to the Standing Committee on Law, etc.

DISTRICT COUNCILLORS AND GUARDIANS (TERM OF OFFICE) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL objected to the Bill being considered at this hour.

MR. BUTCHER (York) appealed to the hon. Member to withdraw his opposition, remarking that the object of the Bill was simply to remedy a defect in the Local Government Act.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL said they were having a large number of Bills to alter that Act. If the law was to be altered the Local Government Board should take the subject up and introduce a comprehensive amending Bill.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): The Local Government Board have no objection to this Bill.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL: The Local Government Board should bring in a measure instead of dealing with the subject in this piecemeal way.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Earl of Hopetoun.)

*EARL SPENCER: I do not rise to offer any opposition to this Bill. In fact, I desire in every possible way, not only in the interests of the Admiralty but of the Reserve men themselves, to give facilities for the modification of any very strict rules with reference to the calling out of the Reserve. When this Bill was introduced elsewhere several objections were taken to it. One objection—I do not think there was any foundation for it, but I should like to be assured on the point—was that there was an intention, by the Bill, to dispense with the notification, on the part of Her Majesty, of the necessity for mobilising the Reserve when the powers were put in force. I trust that is not so. I do not possess a legal mind, but I really cannot see how the necessity for this Bill arises. We heard the other night from the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War that it often happened that some regiments wanted their Reservists of the Second Division long before other regiments wanted the same Reservists, but that under the law as it at present stands a regiment which is deficient in respect of its Reservists cannot call up any one of its Second Division Reservists until all the other regiments who might not require them have called up the Reservists of the same class. And the noble Marquess added that, in order to enable one Line regiment to get the men it wanted, the War Office were obliged to call up the whole of the remainder of the Reservists of that Division, and, as they did not require them, to send them away on furlough. No doubt, to avoid a thing of that sort, it is desirable to give similar powers to the Admiralty; but when I turn to the Act which regulates the calling out of the Reserve it appears to me that the powers given in this Bill already exist. Clause 4 of the Act gives the Admiralty power—

"to order and direct that the Volunteers under this Act, or so many or such part of them as Her Majesty may deem necessary, shall be called in to actual service."

It may be said that they are all called out for a specified time—three years; but in Clause 14 of that Act there is a power given to the Admiralty to "discharge Volunteers raised under this Act." I therefore do not see why it is necessary to give these new powers under this Bill. If, however, according to legal interpretation, such a necessity exists, I should not for a moment wish to oppose the Bill; but as there is some doubt on the subject in the minds of people who are interested in it I would ask the noble Earl who has introduced the Bill to satisfy me on that point, as well as the first one to which I referred.

*THE EARL OF HOPETOUN: I think I can give an assurance to the noble Earl on the first point. There is no intention of interfering with the Proclamation in any way. With regard to the second point raised by the noble Earl, I hold in my hand a very strong opinion from the Law Officers of the Crown that the alterations proposed are absolutely necessary. If the noble Earl will allow the Bill to pass its Second Reading I will undertake to again confer with the Law Officers of the Crown and place their further opinion before him at some future date.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

COUNTY COUNCILS (ELECTIONS) ACT (1891) AMENDMENT BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order). Bill reported without amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

COLONIAL MARRIAGES (DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER) BILL [H.L.].

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1:—

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: The object of my Amendment is to restore the wording of the Bill to that of the Bill of 1898 as it left your Lordships' House. As originally introduced, it did not carry out the intention of its promoters, who desired to limit the operation of the Bill to the marriage of persons actually domiciled in the colonies and to exclude that class of persons known as "carpet baggers," who might visit the colonies simply for the purpose of getting married there and evading the law. My noble friend Lord Strathcona fully intended to introduce the Bill this session as amended in 1898, but by a strange accident, for which no one, I believe, is responsible, the original Bill was substituted.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 1, page 1, line 7, to leave out 'between a man and his deceased wife's sister'; and in line 9, after 'possession' to insert 'between a man and his deceased wife's sister, both being domiciled therein.'"—(Lord James of Hereford.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Clause 1, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Standing Committee negatived. The Report of Amendments to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 110.)

LAND CHARGES BILL [H.L.].

BURIAL GROUNDS BILL. (No. 111.)

ECCELESIASTICAL ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL. (No. 112.)

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a; and to be printed.

LAND REGISTRY (NEW BUILDINGS) BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a; to be printed; and referred the Examiners. (No. 113.)

The House adjourned at a quarter before Five of the clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten of the clock.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—SUGGESTED DISTINCTIVE TITLES.

On the Order for the Second Reading of a number of Local Government Provisional Order Bills,

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) said: I want to make a suggestion, the adoption of which, I believe, would be a great convenience to Members of this House. It is that some title should be given to these Provisional Order Bills. Yesterday there were five on the Paper, and there are six to-day, and in the form in which they stand it is impossible to tell to what places they refer.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman that there is a defect in this matter which might well be remedied, and I will take an early opportunity of communicating with the authorities of the House with a view to carrying out the suggestion next session.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I may point out that the list is printed every Monday, and that from that the information desired can be obtained.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: That shows how easy it would be to apply the remedy.

GREAT INDIAN PENINSULA RAILWAY COMPANY BILL [ANNUITIES].

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) in the Chair.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That it is expedient to authorise the creation of Annuities to be charged on and payable out of the Revenues of India in lieu of the sum of money amounting to £34,859,217 17s. 6d. agreed upon for the purchase by the Secretary of State in Council of India of the undertaking of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, and the payment of any costs and expenses incurred by the said Secretary of State under any Act of the present session for vesting the said undertaking in the said Secretary of State in Council of India; and also any costs, charges, and expenses of obtaining and passing the said Act not provided by the surplus profits arising from the said undertaking for the half-year ending the 30th day of June 1900."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I regret I had yesterday to move the postponement of this motion. I only did so because we really had no information on the subject till the Motion was read out at the Table. The figures involved are very large; they amount to nearly thirty-five millions. I do not for a moment dispute the propriety of the purchase of the railway, nor do I question the method by which the purchase is effected—namely, by the payment of annuities for a certain term of years in lieu of a lump sum down. I should, however, like to ask the noble Lord one or two questions. First, what is the period for which these annuities will run—is it thirty, forty, or fifty years? Then I wish to draw attention to the second part of the resolution. It is clear that the annuities are to be a charge upon the Indian revenues, but I doubt whether the clause with regard to the expense of passing the Act may not constitute a charge on the revenues of the United Kingdom. If the noble Lord will look at the fifth line and onwards he will see what I mean. It refers to the expenses incurred by the Secretary of State, and it appears to me from the wording that they may become a charge on the revenues of the United Kingdom. I thought so yesterday when I heard the resolution read at the Table, and hence I asked to have the matter postponed in order that we might get an explanation from the noble Lord. I have one further observation to make, and it is a suggestion which I commend to the consideration of the noble Lord and of the Government generally. It is that when a resolution is to be moved dealing with a large sum—and this one deals with nearly thirty-five millions—the terms should be given us not on the Blue Paper, because, perhaps, that is too much to ask, but on the White Paper, or, if that cannot be done, on a separate Paper, so that hon. Members may be enabled to gather some idea as to what is asked of them. Otherwise, they are rendered practically incapable of discussing the matter. I am aware that this has not hitherto been the practice, but I suggest that the practice is a faulty one, and as there is, as far as I know, no law, written or unwritten, enforcing the observance of what is admittedly an extremely inconvenient practice, I submit that it might well be amended in the manner I have indicated.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): This is a Bill for the acquisition by the Government of India of a great railway by means of an arrangement which I am glad to say will be financially advantageous to the Government. The Government of India had the option of acquiring the property by two methods of purchase, either by paying a lump sum or by annuity, and they have adopted the latter system for convenience. In fact, they have pursued an analogous course to that adopted in the case of all Bills by which they have in past years acquired possession of similar undertakings. The annuity is to run for fifty years, and includes a sinking fund. No charge whatsoever will be placed on the revenues of this country. The words in the latter part of the motion have been inserted because it is possible that the surplus profits of this line, which passes at once into the hands of the Government, may not be sufficient to meet all the expenses of this Act. I quite agree with my hon. friend that when a transaction of this magnitude is brought before the House, it should be done in such a way that hon. Members may understand what they are about. This is a private Bill, and therefore I am not, in that sense, responsible for the method by which it is introduced to the House; if I had known that it was coming before the House, I would have taken care that in some way or other this resolution was so far brought to the notice of hon. Members, that they would have understood the nature of the transaction.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I do not dispute that the motion is in order, but I wish to ask whether it would not be possible to make this a public instead of a private Bill. This is a great measure for the nationalisation of an Indian Railway, and I think we ought to have some little further information with regard to it. Is this stage merely a preliminary to the introduction of the Bill?

LORD G. HAMILTON: We have followed exactly the precedent which has always been adopted in these cases. The railway is purchased under a contract, and it is necessary to get the assent of the House in order that the annuities may be substituted for the Government guarantee of interest.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I want to know at what point we are now. Is this a motion preliminary to the introduction of the Bill?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Bill has been brought in and read a second time.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: It seems to me absurd that a Bill such as this should go to the Unopposed Private Bill Committee. It imposes an enormous charge upon the revenues of India, and I do not think it is proper that it should be dealt with as a private Bill.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That is not the question now before the House.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I am only suggesting that it might be possible, although the Bill has been brought in as a private Bill, to switch it off into the line of public Bills. It is very inconvenient that a Bill of this magnitude should be brought in as a private Bill.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I also wish to enter the strongest possible protest against the procedure which has been adopted in this case. I thought this was the usual financial resolution preparatory to the introduction of the Bill. I know of no precedent for a Bill which is practically in the charge of the Secretary of State for India being brought in by a private Member.

LORD G. HAMILTON: But it is a private Bill.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I say it ought not to be a private Bill.

*THE CHAIRMAN: That objection should have been taken before the Second Reading.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I do submit that the Secretary for India should have taken care that the House was well informed of the meaning of this resolution before it was asked to pass it.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): The noble Lord has informed us that he is not responsible for the form in which this Bill has been introduced into this House. But he must have known perfectly well what its contents were, and it was only due to the House, even if it was a private Bill, that he should have made it acquainted with the details of a transaction involving a sum of thirty-five millions sterling, before he asked it to sanction the arrangement. Great issues are involved, and it is only right that the House should have some opportunity of discussing the important question raised by this resolution. Our hands, however, are practically tied by the manner in which the Bill has been introduced.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the creation of Annuities to be charged on and payable out of the Revenues of India in lieu of the sum of money amounting to £34,859,217 17s. 6d. agreed upon for the purchase by the Secretary of State in Council of India of the undertaking of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, and the payment of any costs and expenses incurred by the said Secretary of State under any Act of the present session for vesting the said undertaking in the said Secretary of State in Council of India; and also any costs, charges, and expenses of obtaining and passing the said Act not provided by the surplus profits arising from the said undertaking for the half-year ending the 30th day of June, 1900.

and Public Libraries Acts."—(The Lord Advocate.)

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—DISASTERS NEAR LINDLEY ON THE 1ST JUNE.

MR. BUTCHER (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is in a position to give any details as to the disaster to the 13th Battalion Imperial Yeomanry on 1st June; and, whether the wounded belonging to that battalion are in the hands of the British or the Boers.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Government have received any further official details regarding the disasters to the regiment of Yeomanry and to the Sherwood Foresters.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.) (for Mr. WYNDHAM): No details of the disasters to the 13th Battalion Imperial yeomanry and to the 4th Battalion Derbyshire Regiment have yet been received. The wounded Yeomanry are for the most part at Lindley in the charge of General Paget; some however, are at Reitz, which, it is believed, is still held by the enemy.

MR. BUTCHER: Will inquiries be made of the military authorities in South Africa as to the causes which led to these disasters?

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: As a matter of course, inquiry will be made hereafter into every reverse.

MR. BUTCHER: Will the hon. Gentleman give an assurance that an immediate inquiry will be made into the cause of this disaster, which has caused great pain in Dublin, Belfast, and other places where the Yeomanry battalion was raised?

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I will inform my noble friend the Secretary of War of the anxiety with regard to this matter expressed by my hon. friend.

LOST FIELD SERVICE EQUIPMENT— OFFICERS' RESPONSIBILITIES.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether officers and soldiers who have lost personal effects recognised as field service equipment by the capture of a convoy by the enemy will receive compensation at the public expense; and whether an inquiry is held in each case when a convoy is captured, and, if neglect of duty by want of proper precautions be ascertained, whether the officer in charge is called upon to make good any part of such losses or is otherwise held to account.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS (for Mr. WYNDHAM): Officers and soldiers who have lost personal effects which are recognised as field service equipment will receive compensation. The question whether operations in the field have been properly conducted is decided in the first instance by the Commander-in-Chief in the theatre of war. The Secretary of State for War has power under the pay warrant to call upon an officer to make good small losses for which he has been held responsible, but it has never been contemplated that any officer even if blameable would be called upon to make good the loss of a convoy.

NUMBER OF BRITISH TROOPS SENT TO SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state what is the number of the armed forces of all ranks and descriptions which was landed in South Africa between 1st August, 1899, and 31st May, 1900.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS (for Mr. WYNDHAM): The number of men landed in South Africa between the dates mentioned amounts to 204,000.

MARTIAL LAW—STATISTICS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what is the number of persons who have been arrested under its provisions in the districts in South Africa where martial law has been proclaimed, how many of these have been brought to trial, and with what result; whether, and, if so, in how many cases has the intervention of the Supreme Court been invoked, and with what results; whether, and, if so, in how many cases have persons arrested been discharged by the military authorities after conviction and sentence on an appeal being made to the Supreme Court, but irrespective of any intervention on its part; and how many persons arrested have been discharged without being brought to trial.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS (for Mr. WYNDHAM): Directions for the guidance of officers charged with the administration of martial law were issued to all such officers, and they were subsequently instructed to furnish a record of any proceedings taken under martial law. Pending the arrival of such information it is not possible to furnish such a statement as the hon. Member asks for.

CASUALTY LISTS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether during this war and the constant arrival of casualty lists he can arrange for some responsible officer to be at the War Office early in the morning, or certainly by 10 a.m., to give parents and friends information as to the names on the lists.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS (for Mr. WYNDHAM): Throughout the war responsible clerks have been in attendance at the War Office earlier than the hour mentioned by the hon. Member every day except Sundays to give information in regard to casualties.

MR. BARTLEY: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the parents of an officer called at the War Office at 10.10 the other morning to inquire as to the casualties in a certain regiment, and that no one was there to give them any information, while the reply form they filled up has not produced any information since?

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I am not aware of that particular incident. My information is that at that hour there are clerks in attendance prepared to give information.

NON-DELIVERY OF SOLDIERS' CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

SIR J. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, if he can explain why thousands of packages of Christmas presents carefully addressed to our officers and soldiers in South Africa and duly landed at Capetown have not yet been delivered, and especially why three truck loads of parcels were thrown into the Orange River.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS (for Mr. WYNDHAM): I have no information of the matter to which the hon. Member refers. Doubtless some parcels may not have been delivered, but the vast majority reached their destination in spite of the immense difficulties of delivery to men whose location is being constantly changed.

CODE CABLEGRAMS TO THE CAPE.

MR. CHARLES M'ARTHUR (Liverpool Exchange): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether it is now possible to give instructions for an immediate resumption of cypher messages between English commercial houses and their correspondents at Cape Town.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer this. The reply is—No, Sir, I am afraid that it is not possible at present to relax the regulations with regard to code and cypher telegrams.

ROYAL ENGINEERS AND ARTILLERY PROMOTION REGULATIONS.

MR. C. E. SHAW (Stafford): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that in the infantry and cavalry lieutenants are promoted to fill vacancies irrespective of their service, and seeing that such promotion is being attained at the present moment in about seven or eight years, the rule that lieutenants in the Royal Engineers and Artillery can in no case receive promotion until they have served eleven years in that rank may be considered.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS (for Mr. WYNDHAM): There is no such rule as the hon. Member suggests. In the Royal Artillery the promotion to captain follows the same rules as in the cavalry or in infantry. In the Royal Engineers subalterns have the advantage that, while they can at any time be promoted to fill a vacancy, they cannot under any circumstances wait longer than eleven years, as they must be promoted at the end of that period of service.

MR. C. E. SHAW: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the average rate of promotion is eleven years in the Royal Engineers?

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I am informed that the average is considerably less than seven years.

MR. C. E. SHAW: Eleven years.

MOBILISATION ARRANGEMENTS FOR HOME DEFENCE.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state, in the event of augmentation of the Home Army by the mobilisation of the Volunteer Force, what organisation of the Land Forces the Government propose to adopt, and whether the organisation has been taken in hand and how far it has progressed.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS (for Mr. WYNDHAM): The organisation of the troops at home is the same as that which has held good for several years past. Owing to the absence of the force in South Africa the various units have been re-allotted and more use has been made of the Volunteers. Every organised unit has been or will be shortly informed of its allotment and duty in the event of general mobilisation.

MILITIA OFFICERS' COMMISSIONS—EXAMINATIONS.

GENERAL LAURIE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether Militia officers competing in examinations for commissions in the Line in September next will be required to pass in literary and scientific subjects, and so give advantage to those stationed in large garrisons who can attend garrison classes of instruction, or to those in large centres of population where they can obtain private tuition, as compared with those officers at out stations where such arrangements are not practicable; and, whether, as a number of young men have been given commissions lately without any examination, who have had no military training, solely on the recommendation of the heads of institutions which they are attending for purposes of education, he can see his way to accept the recommendation of the Commanding Officer as to the literary qualification of all such Militia officers, and confine competitive subjects to those military matters in which all officers wherever stationed will have an equal chance.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS (for Mr. WYNDHAM): The arrangements in regard to the examinations referred to are under consideration and will, it is hoped, be published at an early date.

GENERAL LAURIE: May I hope that the officers serving with the Militia battalions in South Africa will receive the same consideration as is granted to other officers?

[No answer was returned.]

MILITIA OFFICERS' LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

MR. C. E. SHAW: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that officers of embodied Militia regiments in the Western District are restricted to obtaining leave of absence for a few days only at a time, no matter how urgent their reasons may be for obtaining such leave; and whether, in view of the fact that many of these officers are dependent upon a business or profession, instructions can be given for some further indulgence in the matter of leave being granted, provided such indulgence does not interfere with military efficiency.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS (for Mr. WYNDHAM): Instructions were issued to all general officers commanding on the 14th March that Militia officers were to be granted short periods of leave when possible for the purpose of attending to their private affairs, but the Service must have the first call on their time, and it is desirable to interfere as little as possible with the discretion left to general officers.

COLCHESTER CAMP RIFLE RANGE.

MR. F. W. WILSON (Norfolk, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, having regard to the fact that a number of Volunteers from Norfolk and other places will shortly assemble at Colchester Camp for musketry training, and that the rifle range there, which has cost the country £40,000, is still unopened, whether he can give an assurance that it will be open in time for the reception of the Volunteers.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS (for Mr. WYNDHAM): The range will be opened at once, as the difficulties with the neighbouring owners have just been settled, and it will be ready for the Volunteers when they go into camp.

NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will state the number and class of ships that are to be employed at this year's naval manœuvres, and for how many days they are to continue; also, will experiments be made in coaling a portion of the squadrons from colliers at sea, and whether it is intended that submarine torpedo boats shall form part of the equipment of some of the ships, seeing that this type of craft is now being largely adopted in connection with other navies; and whether detachments of the land forces will in any way co-operate with the fleets in practising the landing and embarkation of men, guns, and stores, similarly to the combinations which took place in connection with the French naval manœuvres last year in the Mediterranean.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I wish to treat my hon. friend with every courtesy, but I hope he will not press me for any information with regard to the naval manœuvres. The arrangements will not be finally settled until towards the middle of July.

INDIAN FAMINE—GRANTS TO NATIVE STATES—PROPOSED PARLIAMENTARY GRANT—RELIEF ORGANISATION—REMISSION OF HOME CHARGES.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will state to which Native States advances of money have been made to help them in dealing with the famine, and what the amount has been in each case.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): On the 31st May I telegraphed to India for a detailed statement of advances made to Native States for famine purposes, but I have not yet received the figures up to date. Papers which have come before me show that some time back there had been advanced to States in Rajputana, £250,000; to States in Central India, £50,000; to States in Kathiawar, £50,000; to States in the Central Provinces, £20,000. A famine loan of £500,000 has also been sanctioned for the Hyderabad State under the guarantee of the Indian Government.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, having regard to the appeal made by the Viceroy of India to the Lord Mayor of London for charitable contributions on behalf of the sufferers by the famine in India, the time has arrived for asking Parliament for a grant from Imperial funds. In putting this question I should like to add at the end the words "to the Indian Exchequer," in order to make it quite clear that I am not proposing that the grant should be made to the Lord Mayor's Fund.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Viceroy's letter was intended to give information as to the purposes to which the money subscribed had been applied, the good results obtained, and the need of further subscriptions for the same objects. But it does not affect the question whether the financial resources of India are sufficient for the task which the Government of that country has undertaken in connection with the relief of famine, a task which, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, is distinct from that to which the money raised by subscription is applied. As to the financial resources of the Government of India, I may state that we have in this country an untouched borrowing power of £9,000,000, a portion of which I propose to utilise next month.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether medical authorities in India have condemned the practice of collecting together people seeking famine relief in large camps which are specially liable to attacks of epidemic disease, instead of distributing them near their own homes ; whether Mr. Monteath, Chief Secretary to Government, has reported that it is undoubtedly true that there is not sufficient establishment in India to deal adequately with the demands for relief, and that it is not supposed that the rules and orders of Government are perfectly carried out ; and whether the India Office still considers that the resources of India are sufficient to deal with the famine.

SIR HENRY FOWLER : I desire to ask a supplementary question, as the noble Lord has not really answered the question I put to him. I asked him whether there was to be a grant from the Imperial to the Indian Exchequer, and the noble Lord, in reply, said they were going to add to the Indian National Debt in order to avoid such a grant. I cannot conceive that that was his meaning, and I will therefore ask him if no grant is to be made from the Imperial Exchequer until the borrowing power of nine millions sterling is exhausted.

LORD G. HAMILTON : I pointed out that the Indian Government have in this country borrowing powers to the extent of £9,000,000. Any grant made by the Imperial Government towards India must be made by loan, and therefore I assumed my right hon. friend would gather that it was only reasonable that the Indian Government should try to realise its own resources before it came to Parliament. I have over and over again informed the House that if assistance is needed it will be granted.

MR. MACLEAN : Does the noble Lord say that the Viceroy of India does not use the resources at his disposal for the relief of the famine, though the people are dying by thousands ?

LORD G. HAMILTON : I did not say anything of the kind. In reply to the question of the hon. Gentleman on the Paper, I have to say that I am not aware that the opinion of medical authorities in India is against large relief works. It is, of course, obvious that there are some disadvantages in collecting the sufferers from famine in large camps, but the system is, on the whole, working well and appears to be the only one under which relief on a large scale can be effectively supervised. I have no knowledge of any such report as that which is attributed in the question to a secretary of the Bombay Government. I have reason to believe that, although there must be much misery and distress connected with so unparalleled a drought, the resources of the Indian Government, as matters now stand, are equal to the task undertaken by that Government in respect of the famine.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.) : The noble Lord has said it would be impossible to grant aid without having recourse to a loan, but would it not be possible in view of the exigencies of the famine to remit to the Indian Government for this year or for a given number of years certain annual payment made for military and other services by the Indian Government to the Home Government.

*MR. SPEAKER : Order, order ! That is an entirely new question.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN MOVEMENT— CAPTURE OF TA-KU FORTS— AFFAIRS ON THE YANG-TSZE.

MR. YERBURGH (Chester) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether arrangement has been made to supplement the forces on the Yang-tsze ; and whether any intimation has been conveyed to the Viceroy of the Yang-tsze region that they will be held personally responsible for any injury to the lives and property of British subjects.

SIR H. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs) : Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will also say whether he has any further information as to the general position in China.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford) : The Admiralty have made arrangements for stationing additional ships at the most important ports on the Yang-tsze. Her Majesty's ships will, if necessary, co-operate with the Viceroy on the Yang-tsze in the maintenance of order. No circumstances have at present arisen on the Yang-tsze making further action necessary. The latest information we have received as to the general position of affairs in China is the following telegram from Commanding Officer, Her Majesty's ship "Endymion," Wei-hai-wei, 18th June, 1900, 8.30 p.m.

"After six hours' engagement on the 17th June, Ta-ku forts (which fired on the ships of the allied squadron) were silenced and occupied by the allied forces. On the previous afternoon additional men for storming forts were sent inshore from the ships. The British ships up the river engaged were 'Algerine,' sloop; 'Fame' and 'Whiting,' torpedo-boat destroyers; two latter captured four Chinese torpedo-boat destroyers. Casualties—'Algerine,' slight. Storming party and others unknown. Allied Admirals detained Chinese second-class cruiser flying Admiral's flag outside Ta-ku. No information of Commander-in-Chief China's return to Tientsin Bay had been received by the Rear-Admiral by 2 p.m. 17th June."

This information is later than that we received yesterday by Japanese gunboat.

BRITISH SUBJECTS AT PEKING.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can communicate to the House any information relating to the safety of British subjects at Peking.

*MR. BRODRICK: We have no news from Peking of later date than that already communicated to the House.

INDIAN TROOPS DESPATCHED TO CHINA—EXPENSES.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the expenses, ordinary and extraordinary, of the Indian troops being despatched to Hong Kong and China will be borne entirely by the Imperial Government.

LORD G. HAMILTON: All expenses, ordinary and extraordinary, of any Indian troops who may be despatched to Hong Kong and China will be borne entirely by the Imperial Government.

ASHANTI—NATIVE RISING—INVESTMENT OF COOMASSIE.

MR. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is able to communicate to the House the names of the European officials, traders, and missionaries now besieged in Coomassie, and the latest reports received as to the health and position of the garrison.

*MR. BRODRICK: In the absence of my right hon. friend, perhaps I may be allowed to read his reply. The Europeans in Coomassie, so far as the names are known, are Sir Frederic and Lady Hodgson, Major Morris, Captains Marshall, Digan, Aplin, Armitage, Parmeter, Bishop, Leggett, Cochrane, and Read, Lieutenant Berthon, Mr. Ralph, Doctors Garland, Tweedy, Chalmers, Graham, Hay, and Macfarlane, Mr. Ramseyer, and five other missionaries whose names are not known. The latest information is contained in a letter from the Governor, dated the 4th of June, in which he said that the state of health was good.

BRITISH SOUTH COAST FISHERIES. AND FOREIGN TRAWLERS.

SIR CAMERON GULL (Devonshire, Barnstaple): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, having regard to the complaints of fishermen in the Channel and on the South Coast of damage to their gear caused by foreign trawlers, Her Majesty's Government would consider in conjunction with foreign Governments the advisability of the extension of the principles of the North Sea Convention to those areas.

*MR. BRODRICK: Representations have already been made to the Belgian Government in connection with the recent cases of damage to the gear of British fishermen off the South Coast. It is doubtful, however, whether the provisions of the North Sea Fisheries Convention would afford a complete remedy in these particular cases. When the result of the representations which have been made has been ascertained, Her Majesty's Government will further consider the matter.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Will the right hon. Gentleman make representations to the French Government, which is much more largely concerned?

[No answer was given.]

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK ACCOUNTS.

SIR EDGAR VINCENT (Exeter): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, if he can give the approximate amount standing to the credit of deposit accounts.

in the Post Office Savings Bank on which no operation has taken place for more than ten years.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I fear I cannot give the information asked for. It could only be supplied by a detailed examination of the depositors' accounts, which number over eight millions; and I do not see that any result would be obtained which would justify the labour and expense of such an examination.

POST OFFICE AND TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANKS ADMINISTRATION.

SIR EDGAR VINCENT: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state what the profit or loss to the Treasury has been since 1861 from operations in connection with the Post Office Savings Bank. I beg also to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can say what the profit or loss to the Treasury has been since 1880 from operations in connection with the Trustee Savings Banks.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will answer these questions together, as I agree with Sir Stafford Northcote's observations in 1877, to the effect that the subject must be considered as a whole. The net profit in respect of the Post Office Savings Banks cannot be given for any earlier year than 1876 as the income and capital accounts were not separated—but since 1876 it has been £1,565,000. The net loss in respect of the income of Trustee Banks since 1880 has been £197,000, to which should be added the charge on public funds in the same period for making good previous deficiencies of capital amounting to £1,590,000—making a total of £1,787,000. Therefore the cost of the Trustee Banks since 1880 has exceeded the profit derived from the Post Office Banks by £222,000.

EDINBURGH POST OFFICE—REVISION OF DUTIES.

MR DEWAR (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, when the scheme of revision of the sorting branch of the Edinburgh Post Office, which has been under consideration for about two years, is likely to be sanctioned, and if he would say what has been the cause of the delay.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The scheme is at present under the consideration of the Treasury. As explained to the Hon. Member on the 8th ult. it involves many details, but, it is hoped, will be decided very shortly.

THE SHERIFFSHIP OF ROSS AND CROMARTY.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that Mr. W. C. Smith, Sheriff of Ross and Cromarty, has announced his intention of complying with a requisition of Aberdeen electors to stand as a candidate for Parliament; if so, whether Mr. Smith has resigned his sheriffship; and, if not, whether there is any precedent for a candidate for Parliamentary honours retaining that judicial office.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): The fact is as stated in the first paragraph of the question. Concurrently with the announcement referred to, Mr. Smith dispatched to me at Dover House his resignation for presentation in the proper quarter, but owing to the accident that this happened during the Parliamentary holiday it did not come into my hands for a few days later.

LAND REVENUE RECORDS AND ENROLMENTS OFFICE

MR. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General whether the Land Revenue Records and Enrolments Office at St. Stephen's House, Victoria Embankment, is a public office, having the custody of public records; and, if so, why all the records and public documents kept therein are not open to public inspection in the same manner as the records are at the Record Office, on payment of proper fees; whether he is aware that the Court Rolls kept at the said Land Revenue Office relating to the manorial properties held by the Crown cannot be inspected by the public without the permission of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests; and, if so, by what statutory power have the latter the right to refuse or allow such inspection; and, whether he will cause immediate inquiry to be made into the matter with a view to the public being allowed inspection and copies of such records on payment of reasonable fees such as are charged at the Record Office.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): I have made inquiry into this matter and find that some of the documents in the Land Revenue Record Office are open to public inspection. The rules of that office as to the particular classes of documents so open to inspection are in accordance with an opinion given in 1864 by the Law Officers of the Crown. If any document which it is desired to inspect relates to property under the management of some public department the written consent of such department is required before inspection is allowed. The fees payable for inspection and copies are fixed by the Treasury under 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 1, s. 22, and are considered reasonable.

HOME OFFICE VOTE—CHIEF INSPECTOR OF FACTORIES' REPORT.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is possible to circulate the Annual Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories, with a view to the discussion of the Home Office Vote.

MR. HANBURY: I do not think the Report can be circulated before Thursday morning at the earliest. So far as my present information goes there has been very considerable delay on the part of the printers, for which they will, of course, be asked to account.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: Then what course does the Leader of the House intend to take with regard to the Home Office Vote on Friday?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I understand the right hon. Baronet is unwilling to take the discussion—

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I am not unwilling, but other Members may be.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If there is an idea that more time should be given for the study of the Report I will not press the Vote, but will take Votes in Class 2 in lieu thereof.

TREASURE TROVE AT CARDIFF.

MR. MACLEAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury with reference to the discovery at Sully, near Cardiff, of a hoard of gold rings, silver coins, etc., of the Roman period, over which the lord of the manor has renounced his right of treasure trove, whether the Treasury proposes to offer these articles for purchase to the British Museum, or whether it will offer them to the Cardiff Museum, which wishes to acquire the whole collection.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This matter is now under consideration.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed during this session with the Education (Scotland) Bill; and, if so, can he name a day on which the Second Reading will be taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it convenient to supplement the general view I gave yesterday of the business of the House by detailed answers in reference to particular Bills.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: What Army Votes is it intended to take to-night? I presume the right hon. Gentleman does not intend to exhaust all the Army Votes.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall take the Votes in their order, but will reserve Vote 13 in order that later on in the session there may, if necessary, be an opportunity of further discussing War Office matters. I hope good progress will be made, as it is important in the public interest to get as many Votes as possible.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

MR. WODEHOUSE reported from the Committee of Selection, That they had added to the Standing Committee on Law and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure the following fifteen Members in respect of the Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill:—Mr. Arnold, Mr. Bond, Mr. Brigg, Mr. Jesse Collings, Sir John Dillwyn-Llewelyn, Mr. Dewar, Mr. Howell, Mr. Hozier, Mr. Humphreys-Owen, Mr. William Jones, General Lauria, Mr. Lloyd-George, Mr. Maclean, Mr. Herbert Roberts, and Mr. Alfred Thomas.

Mr. WODEHOUSE further reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from the Joint Committee of Lords and Commons on Municipal Trading:—Sir Leonard Lyell; and had appointed in substitution: Sir John Leng.

Reports to lie upon the Table.

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1900–1901.

1. £10,000,000, Transport and Remounts.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I wish to say a few words with reference to our transport system. In the opinion of a good many members of the Committee the present system of obtaining remounts leaves a great deal to be desired, because under that system we get untrained horses, and pay a considerable price for them. Now, I should like to suggest to the War Office that they should adopt the transport system which is in vogue in Austro-Hungary. The system, briefly, is this. In 1866 the Emperor Francis Joseph established ten stud dépôts in Hungary and eight in Austria. Stallions of the best quality were purchased and sent to these dépôts, and from thence they were sent out at regular intervals to particular centres in order to serve the mares of farmers at nominal prices—say, a few shillings. The only bargain made by the Government with the farmers was that the produce of the mares should be available for the Government at a settled price. That price varied from £16 to £32. It works out at about £25 per horse, the highest price paid for cavalry horses being £32, and for draught horses £22. No horse is bought by the War Office under five years of age. Anyone who has taken an interest in the horsing of our cavalry regiments knows well that, although a regiment may be 350 strong, only about 180 horses can be put into the line on the occasion of a review. The other horses are either young horses which have to be left in barracks to be walked round in circles by recruits, or else they are old and useless horses which are simply kept for drill and other purposes. In our service we are supposed not to buy horses under four years of age, but practically we buy them at three years old, and that is why their services cannot be utilised on these occasions. It is an absolute fact that in our service we retain a great many old horses which ought to have been cast long since. Some years ago the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean called for a Return of the horses over fourteen years of age, and it was found that an extraordinarily large number of these animals were in use. I would suggest to the Government that they should try to establish remount dépôts and stud dépôts. Ireland is about one of the best horse-breeding countries which can be found in the world. You cannot get better pastures than are to be found in Westmeath and in Tipperary. But unfortunately the Irish farmer cannot afford to buy good stud horses, and so he has to put his mares to cheap stallions, and the result is that the produce is not worth anything like so much as would be the case if the farmers had good stallions. Further than that, the money which should go into the breeders' hands too frequently is pocketed by the middleman. I should like to call attention to the system of reserves which obtains in Austro-Hungary. Out of every 100 horses only fifty are at once taken, and the remaining fifty are lent out in the neighbourhood to the farmers and dealers. The horses are brought up every year for four weeks training, and are examined by Government inspectors every spring. If the horses are looking well, the farmer or dealer gets a small bonus; if not he is fined. At the end of five and a half years for draught horses, and six and a half years for cavalry horses, the farmers and dealers are allowed to retain the animals for their own use. I suggest that is a very cheap way of having a reserve of horses, and I think it will compare very favourably with the system adopted by the English Government, who take 'bus horses and cab horses, and all sorts of animals, as they have had to do lately. It is false economy to take young horses at the price we pay, because we are not able to utilise them. It is a fact that we retain in the service a great many old horses—relics of antiquity, as many of my hon. friends in this House will be able to confirm—simply for the purpose of economy, and these horses ought to have been cast long ago. The War Office should try to establish remount depôts and stud depôts in Ireland, and if the Government will endeavour to follow the system of reserve of horses which obtains in Austro-Hungary, I believe they will do a good turn to English and Irish farmers, and at the same time secure a good class of horse for the service. I think in the interests of common-sense the Government should take this matter into serious consideration.

*CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I have to move a reduction of this Vote in order to call attention to the immense waste of the taxpayers' money in connection with remounts, brought about mainly by the defective state of the Army Veterinary Department. We have at the present moment in South Africa 150,000 animals, the value of which at a low computation would be something like a quarter of a million sterling, yet all these animals are placed in charge of forty-seven veterinary surgeons. Notwithstanding that some time ago I drew the attention of this House to the fact that this Department was far below its proper standard, and that there was a difficulty in obtaining men—

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is taking exception to the Veterinary Department. That comes under another Vote, and any criticism of the Department should be taken on that Vote and not upon this.

*CAPTAIN NORTON: Am I not in order in referring to the defective management of the Remount Department, and in pointing out that, owing to the deficiency of veterinary surgeons, large numbers of these horses were lost on the voyage out, and more perhaps have been lost in South Africa owing to there being an insufficient number of experienced veterinary surgeons?

Major Rasch.

*THE CHAIRMAN: This seems to me to be a matter which is relative to the Vote for the Veterinary Department.

*CAPTAIN NORTON: Of course, Sir, I bow to your ruling, and I will raise the point later on.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I wish to support what my hon. friend has said with reference to the general question of remounts. It appears that after all we have a use for our Army, and we therefore require cavalry horses for that Army. So far as I can make out, we have only a proportion of one-third horses to men. That is not the system which was relied upon in past years, for we find that Charles XII. of Sweden adopted a very different plan, with the result that he was able to cover with his cavalry ninety miles a day from day to day. His system was exactly the contrary to that which is in vogue in the British Army for, instead of having fewer horses than men, he had twice as many horses as men. The fact was that he had two horses for each man, whereas the British Army has twice as many troopers as horses. I am conscious that when you have so large a number of horses you have to deal with the difficulty of providing forage, but, after all, that is a transport difficulty with which we need not trouble ourselves. What we want to look at is the mobility of our force, and as far as I can make out the best way of securing that mobility is to have more horses than men. I do not feel at liberty to enter into the details of this matter, but I am bound to say that in our recent purchases we have acted on a very bad system. We wanted a large number of horses for South Africa, and we had to send for them to all the four quarters of the world. We had to send, for instance, to the Argentine Republic, and there we bought, I believe, all the wrong horses. We bought the horses from the plains instead of the hill horses, and assuredly the latter were the proper class of animal to have been purchased for operations in South Africa. I wish to impress upon my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War that the time has arrived when we must buckle to on this question of remounts, and consider whether we cannot adopt some such system as that which exists in Austro-Hungary. That system may not be exactly adequate to our requirements, but I believe it is one that is perfectly well adapted to the needs of this country. Under our present system we buy horses without any opportunity of examining them as to their condition, and the result is we purchase from Jew contractors, who make enormous profits on them, horses which are not fit for our purpose, and which are put on board ship and afterwards die during the sea voyage. This can only be avoided by the adoption of a plan to provide the country with remounts on some such system as has been suggested by my hon. and gallant friend, and I believe that if some such plan were put in force it would be a valuable addition to one of the most important branches of our Army.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I have no intention of posing as an authority on the question of the purchase of horses. The question of remounts for the Army is most complicated, and I am sure that the representatives of the War Office will welcome any suggestion that can be made by those practically acquainted with the breeding of horses, and with horse markets generally in this country and elsewhere. I also cannot vie with the hon. Gentleman opposite in his familiarity with the proceedings of Charles XII. of Sweden, but there is one point to which the hon. Gentleman referred, and to which the hon. and gallant Member for South-east Essex also drew attention, upon which I do know something from my own point of view. They spoke of the system in vogue in Austro-Hungary. Now, I have for years past visited that country, and I should like to point out to my hon. and gallant friend that in those countries they have this great advantage which we do not possess here—namely, that the horses used for agricultural purposes are precisely the class of horses which are required for the cavalry. I have often wondered how the horses used in that country could do the work put upon them in view of the condition of the roads over which they have to pass. But I would like to point out that the horses used for agricultural purposes in this country are of an entirely different character, and are not suitable for cavalry work. I think possibly that will be found to lie at the root of the system in Austro-Hungary. Whether or not the Government of that country encourages the use of this particular class of horse for agricultural purposes I cannot say, but I repeat that there the military authorities have an immense advantage which we in this country would not enjoy.

COLONEL WELBY (Taunton): The hon. Member for King's Lynn has referred to the discrepancy between the number of men and the number of horses in the cavalry regiments. But I think the statements in reference to this matter are too often misleading. People are apt to forget that in a cavalry regiment men are employed in other capacities than as troopers. There are the waiters, storemen, and the clerks. These men are not mounted, and yet they are absolutely necessary for the service of the regiment. They could not attend to horses if they were supplied with them. Many of them, as a matter of fact, do not follow the regiment into the field. Probably the only ones who do are the cooks, who are, of course, necessary. Then in regard to the historical reference indulged in by the hon. Member for King's Lynn, I should very much doubt whether Charles XII. of Sweden troubled himself very much about the way in which his horses were groomed. In this country, however, we make a tremendous point of that, and the commanders of regiments are judged upon that matter. Now, if each man had charge of two horses it would be very difficult for him to attend to them properly. We have to remember that men go into hospital, and that in the winter time they expect to have their furloughs, and I would suggest, after all, that if a man took two horses into the field he would not be able to give much attention to the enemy, especially if the animals were not well trained to stand under fire. I believe that if we insisted upon every man having two horses it would be absolutely impossible to get men to join the cavalry. Undoubtedly, the remount system constitutes a very weak point in our cavalry system, and I would urge that the particulars given in the Estimates should show the exact number of trained and untrained horses, and of those unfitted for the field. I can remember a case in which a certain regiment which had a strength of 420 horses was able to, on one particular occasion, put 400 on parade, and it was admitted to be something wonderful. I think it would be a very great pity indeed to cast all horses over fourteen years or sixteen years of age, because a large number of these horses prove very useful until they reach nineteen years. In regard to the employment of middlemen in the purchase of horses, I quite agree with my hon. friend that it is undesirable to encourage such a practice. Then I come to the suggestion that we should adopt the system of Austro-Hungary in regard to the supply of horses for the Army. That may be a very good plan, but I am not certain that it is suited to the circumstances of this country. It appears to me that the only alternative is for the Government themselves to set up breeding establishments. I am afraid that under our system nearly the whole of our best horses produced in Ireland are taken away by foreign Powers. If foreign nations choose to give a pound or two more, we cannot expect English farmers to do otherwise than sell them to foreigners. The only way to meet the difficulty would be to subsidise the farmers who rear the horses, although I cannot say that I am altogether in favour of adopting that course. Failing this, we must fall back on Government breeding establishments, which seems to be the only alternative. There is one small matter I should like to ask a question about, and it is in reference to the food. We all remember the unfortunate incident that took place at Aldershot, resulting in the loss of the lives of several of our soldiers. A good deal of blame has been thrown upon the commanding officers because upon that day the men had not had a proper midday meal. Supposing that bread and cheese had been allowed upon that occasion, would the transport have been provided? In cavalry regiments this allowance is all right, but I am told that in nearly all the infantry regiments the cart in which the midday meal is carried is provided at the expense of the soldiers by the canteen. If so, it has really been provided for out of the men's own pockets. I think it is a question which really wants to be looked into. If we are to blame commanding officers for anything of this kind, we ought to see that the Government provide everything which is necessary.

*SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (Wigtonshire): As a civilian I feel some difficulty in taking part in a debate of so technical a nature, and I will not detain the Committee for many minutes. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, has given very fairly the reason for not relying upon any good results from the adoption of the Austro-Hungarian system by this country. Everyone must recognise the truth of what he said as to the general character of our agricultural horses. I hardly agree with my hon. and gallant friend who has just sat down that we should rely entirely upon supplying our remounts within the limit of these islands, for we can only do so if the Government undertake large breeding establishments. That is the only way in which the supply can be made regular, sufficient, and of proper quality.

COLONEL WELBY: I suggested the subsidising of farmers as well as breeding establishments.

*SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: I have no doubt the farmers will offer no objection to the subsidy suggested, but I doubt whether the supply from that source will be rendered uniform or regular enough even by the application of subsidies. What I want to ask my right hon. friend to consider is this: We pay some penalty for living in an island; it has many advantages, but we have some corresponding disabilities, and among them is the impossibility of producing horses on valuable land at a reasonable price. I want my hon. friend to consider whether there are not within the limits of this Empire vast areas not only capable of turning out horses of the best quality, but which do at the present time turn out such horses. Of Australian horses I know nothing, but of Canadian horses I have had some experience. One of the best hunters I ever had in my life was a Canadian horse. I would ask my hon. friend if he is acquainted with the quality of the horses which are imported into this country in large quantities by some of our large corporations for tramway purposes? Take Glasgow, for instance. These horses are sound, of good constitution, good-looking, and quite well bred enough for the purpose. Apparently the supply is unlimited, although I cannot quote the average price now; but I know that the price a few years ago was exceedingly moderate. I am unable to answer the problem propounded by my hon. friend the Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Bowles) — namely, how a good supply of horses could be secured for this country without crossing the sea. Of course, they must cross the sea, and some means must be found of keeping up a regular supply. Wherever these horses have to be used they must cross the sea, and all I have to ask my hon. friend is to consider the enormous resources of a country like Canada for supplying horses of the quality required.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): I desire to thank all those hon. Members who have taken part in this discussion up to the present for the spirit in which they have approached these questions. I quite recognise that we are now discussing very important matters, but if I may be allowed to make one appeal it is that we should get through our work as fast as possible this afternoon, because this money is actually wanted at once. Therefore it is of great importance that the money should be voted to-day, as there is absolute need of the money for the war. I believe that we can thresh out all the details if we address ourselves to the debate in the same spirit which has characterised the speeches of hon. Members so far. I think the right hon. Baronet the Member for Wigtonshire put his finger on the consideration which underlies all this controversy when he reminded the House that we live in an island. Those responsible for the provision of horses in Austria and France know with great accuracy where and under what conditions the cavalry of their army may be expected to fight. But who could say where the cavalry of England might have to fight? Let me ask hon. Members of this Committee to reflect on what has taken place during the present war. I will give a few figures as a starting point to this discussion. During the course of the present war we have shipped to South Africa altogether up to the 12th of June 91,600 horses. The number of horses shipped to South Africa excludes altogether the number that has been purchased there. Would anybody, on the ground of common-sense or economy, or on the grounds urged by the Member for South-east Essex, ask any Government to maintain an expensive remount establishment and a stud in England, which is the most expensive country in the world, with the prospect of taking the horses so reared a long sea journey at a cost of £35 per horse, as against the very much lower rate charged for horses from Argentina, Australia, Canada, and elsewhere? That lies at the bottom of the whole economic argument, and although I do not press the economic argument too far in this House—I have always been prepared to say that we ought to spend our money to get a good article—still there are limits, and when we find that the sea transport of horses from this country costs more than the horses themselves delivered free from other parts of the world, I doubt whether we should be justified in raising horses in this country to meet the needs of a great war. That consideration must underlie all our purchases. I know very well the great studs at Saumur, in France, and for my part I should be delighted to see such establishments in this country. There these establishments are arranged with 1,700 horses always standing together with their veterinary departments attached, and with different breeds of horses, including the English thoroughbred. I should be delighted if we had in this country such an establishment, but I could never honestly recommend it to the Committee of this House, knowing that horses raised in that manner in this country would cost infinitely more than our horses now cost, and they might also prove to be totally unfit for the various physical conditions of the country to which they might be sent. Of the 91,600 horses shipped to South Africa a certain number of them were sent from this country; others were sent from Canada, from Australia, India, and from other sources which, following the example of my hon. friend, I do not care to name. The Australian horses have cost us, delivered on the beach in South Africa, £45 each; the Argentine horses cost, delivered on the beach in South Africa, £26 each. But the mere passage of a horse from England to South Africa costs £35, and we cannot get the English horse, even under the conditions which now prevail, for less than £35 or £40; so that the total cost of the English horse delivered on the beach in South Africa is from £70 to £75. If you consider the colossal losses which must fall upon the horses in any campaign; if you consider that, after all, the cobs of 14-2 hands which you buy in Argentina or Australia will do your work, and serve your purpose under the conditions of modern warfare just as well as the expensive English horse—for as food for powder one horse is as good to die as another—should I be justified in asking this Committee to pay three times as much as is necessary for an article which is so perishable? That is my answer on the ground of economy. We do not know beforehand the physical conditions of the country in which our cavalry will have to fight, and it is just as well to keep our hands free to purchase horses suited for a particular campaign, and which can be conveyed to the theatre of war most expeditiously and in reasonable numbers. It is not true that the War Office has proceeded in a huffer-muffer way with regard to the provision of remounts. There are officers who have been chosen because of their acquaintance with horses. Officers have been out since July last, not purchasing, but marking down all the good horses in the market and getting options for purchase. That we believe to be a common-sense and an economical plan. Our greatest difficulty in the cavalry springs from the enormous amount of work which the young recruit has to do. We have been going into that very urgent and somewhat melancholy question—namely, the great number of men who have purchased their discharges shortly after joining the Army. Inquiries have been made in Ireland as to the men who have purchased their discharges, and the overwhelming majority of the replies were to the effect that the men liked the cavalry, but did not like the amount of stable duty that had to be done. It has been suggested that there should be two horses for every man, but conceive a regiment in which there were two horses to every man. After each man had done duty as a soldier, and all the necessary work falling on an individual in a community, he would then have to buckle to in order to do the work of a helper. I do not suppose there is any stable in which a helper would be required to mind more than two horses; but after looking after two horses the cavalryman would have to clean his clothes and perhaps have to take part in a field day. The suggestion is absolutely impossible and out of the question. Again, many horses must be purchased more or less after the war comes on, and why, therefore, should we have in a cavalry regiment more horses than we need, in order to mount the men for the fullest parade or field day? Where is the sense and where is the economy? The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Taunton says we do not mark off the young horses from the old; but every hon. Member who has spoken on the subject, and who has taken an intelligent interest—as so many hon. Gentlemen do—in this question knows all the facts. I admit the facts, and I maintain that they are reasonable, and that the system which prevails is the best and cheapest system. It has also been asked whether the Department has considered other portions of the Empire. The Department has considered that question, and I admit to very great personal disappointment when I discovered that two or three year old horses bred or bought in South Africa, and raised there for use in South Africa, would possibly cost more than if we had been able to import them. Nothing is more expensive than keeping horses, and to buy a horse that is not going to be used for two years is one of the most expensive things in the world. That is my answer to the attack which has been made on the Department for purchasing through middlemen. When we purchase from middlemen no doubt we pay more than if we purchased direct, but the middleman has taken the risk of buying the horses subject to illness or accident, and he gives us a finished article and derives a legitimate profit. It is not the case, however, that the Department purchases horses only from middlemen. I was present myself when a gentleman representing the War Office bought four horses from farmers who had bred them. We have experts all over the country who are in touch with sellers of the horses best suited for cavalry purposes, and I do not think it is possible to mount our men in time of peace on any other principle than that which has guided the War Office during the last twelve months.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I do not wish to prolong this debate in any way, and I agree with most of the things that have been said during the discussion. There is one point, however, connected with the Vote which I do not think has been taken into consideration, and that is the question of remounts not only for the cavalry but also for the artillery and transport. These are heavy horses, and I wish to press on the War Office authorities the necessity of having lighter carts than the usual regimental transport is supplied with. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Taunton has touched upon what happened at Aldershot. The enormous difficulty of supplying transport for purposes such as taking provisions into the field would be lessened if there were lighter carts, which would also be better for the horses. There is a great waste of horse-flesh under the present system of heavy wagons now used. When these heavy wagons were taken to South Africa it was found that they were not as useful as the smaller and lighter carts. I think some system of lighter carts ought, therefore, to be considered at an early date for all light purposes, both regimental and transport. There was the case of New Zealand offering carts to the War Office. The War Office replied that they would be delighted to accept them, but that first of all they should be sent to Woolwich to be inspected. Of course, the New Zealand Government did not send the carts to Woolwich because, possibly, they would have been returned. There is one other question I should like to put, and that has reference to registered horses. I should like to know what number has been taken, and whether the system has proved to be a success. I should like to hear the War Office opinion on that subject, because it is one of considerable importance. I would wish to know whether it has really been put into practice to the greatest possible extent, or if only 100 horses have been taken out of say every 1,000 registered. There is also an item in this Vote for expenses for the removal of troops at home. I hope that as little money as possible will be spent in this direction during the present expensive year. I find the case of a Scotch regiment of Militia which was sent to Glasgow, then to Aldershot, then back to Glasgow again, and afterwards to Ireland. That seems a very great waste of money, and I hope that as few such cases will take place as possible. Of course, it is necessary to send regiments into camp for training, especially regiments recently embodied; but I hope that great economy will be practised in the removal of regiments during the present expensive year.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I should not like this Vote to pass without acknowledging the enormous services which have been rendered by the transport department in South Africa, and also the services rendered by the War Office and the Admiralty in conveying troops, horses, and stores to the seat of war. The country is enormously indebted to the Army Service Corps for the extraordinary loyalty with which they carried out the transport reorganisation in January last. It was very trying to many of the officers concerned, and it is to their great loyalty and hard work that a great deal of the success of the campaign is due. There is a very strong feeling among officers of all arms that the regimental and brigade system of transport inaugurated by Sir Redvers Buller, and for which we are mainly indebted to him, should not be abandoned in favour of the old general system of transport under which regimental officers were enabled to get what they wanted and when they wanted it. Although it was necessary for Lord Kitchener to institute the system at present in force in South Africa, the feeling is general throughout all arms that the regimental and brigade system should not be abandoned. It has been productive of very great benefit, and it would be extremely unpopular if any permanent change were effected. A great deal has been said as to the cavalry remounts. I visited most of our remount establishments in South Africa, and I can fully bear out what the Under Secretary has said regarding the ability shown by the officers selected to purchase horses for the army. It is perfectly extraordinary that such an enormous number of horses as 91,600 should have been landed in South Africa with so few accidents. I wish I could say that English horses had proved more suitable than Canadian, Australian, or Argentine horses, but I must endorse the view which has been expressed by my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War. The English horses were as a rule too big, and they suffered dreadfully in the voyage out, first from the rough sea in the Bay of Biscay, then from the great heat in the Tropics, and again from the change of climate when nearing Cape Town. Another thing which militated against them was the system of docking their tails which prevails in this country, though not in Australia, Canada, or the Argentine. A great deal of the mortality among the English horses was due to the enormous suffering they endured because they had nothing to protect themselves against the pest of flies. One of the criticisms heard in South Africa against our administration was that there was too much grooming and curry-combing of cavalry horses, which prevented them from being protected by the natural oil in their coats from the plague of flies, which no one can understand who has not seen it. The horses sent from this country in many cases suffered severely when there was a bad voyage, and in some cases, though I will not mention names, slings were not provided. Certainly the only horses which I saw arrive in decent condition at the remount establishments in South Africa were those of the C.I.V. Artillery. They had been exercised on board for twenty minutes twice a day, but of course that could not be done on smaller vessels. The Argentine horses have been very successful indeed. They have been of the right size. I think one of the great lessons which this campaign has taught us is that big horses which are difficult to mount are quite unsuitable for mounted infantry. These ought to be furnished with smallish horses, which are easy to mount. With big horses when an enemy suddenly appears the men have difficulty in getting on horseback, and the saddles frequently slip round. Not a few of the casualties in killed and wounded in this war have been due to the excessive size of the cavalry horses. The Canadian horses have also done exceedingly well, and in some respects the Australian—but by no means all. They are frequently much too big. The 142 horses from the Argentine and the 15 hand horses from Canada have been invaluable. I wish to say one word in regard to home transport. If anyone sees a regiment move at home he must be struck with the enormous amount of baggage which is necessary, and how much its mobility is thereby reduced. When I was in the Army I thought it quite easy to increase regimental mobility, if the Government would only furnish the officers' quarters, and charge them with a rent. Of course, officers might add, at their pleasure and own cost, to the furnishings afterwards. I think officers are entitled to six hundred-weight, but that amount is invariably exceeded, and an entire train is often required to carry the officers' furniture.

Sir Howard Vincent.

They must have it, because they have to go into rooms absolutely unfurnished, with no beds, no furniture, no curtains, and if they do not take furniture with them they would have nothing but the bare boards to sleep upon. I most earnestly urge upon my hon. friend, who is anxious to do everything that he possibly can in the direction of improvement, to consider whether the efficiency of the Army as a whole, and its mobility and capability of moving from one garrison to another, might be increased by furnishing officers' quarters, mess premises, and canteens. I believe that, apart from first expenditure, the Department would make a profit on it; at any rate they would pay a very decent interest on the outlay. The object of the Government ought to be to make the Army as efficient as it possibly can be made. The hon. Member the Under Secretary for War knows perfectly well that when it is a question with the Horse Guards or the Quartermaster General's Department about the moving of a regiment from this station to that, it is not always the need of the service which is considered. They say, "We cannot move this regiment so soon. Just look at the expense that the officers were put to in moving so recently; and it is not right to make them incur that expense so soon again." In connection with this matter there is the case of the married men, especially the non-commissioned officers and men of the Household Brigade. The cavalry regiments of the Household Brigade move every six months, and these unfortunate people have to pack up their furniture and move from Knightsbridge to Albany Street, and from Albany Street to Windsor. We all know that if we move furniture at all—I do not say there is a leakage on every occasion, but there is a breakage. Things go wrong, and it must necessarily be so in a greater degree in the case of the married men in a regiment of the Army, who are not able to superintend the packing of their luggage, or of necessity have to do it in a rough and ready way. If it is necessary to move a cavalry regiment of the Household Brigade once in six months from one barrack to another, or from one station to another, or across the street, I earnestly entreat my hon. friend the Under Secretary of State for War to endeavour to do something to furnish the married quarters, something for the mess premises, something for the canteens, and something for the officers' quarters. If he does so he will do a great deal to increase the efficiency of the Army and the comfort of the officers and men.

*CAPTAIN NORTON: I wish to say a few words in reference to the transport. I believe every word that has fallen from the Under Secretary of State in reference to remounts. It is quite clear to those who have considered most the conditions of modern warfare, that we should take the nearest and handiest supply of horses when the occasion arises. It would be absolutely impossible to have stud establishments in this country sufficient to supply such a demand as has been made recently. But that brings into greater prominence than ever the necessity for perfecting our system of transport with reference to horses. Previous to the case of the ship "Rapidan" there was no veterinary officer on the Board of Selection for Transports. I am aware that that has since been remedied. I only deal with the point incidentally in order to show the necessity for having proper veterinary officers on board ship to prevent the loss of horses during transport by sea, which is much too great at present. The "Devonia" was sent out to Naples to take mules to South Africa. A veterinary officer was in charge who is now the second senior officer in the Army Veterinary Department in South Africa and a thoroughly competent man. That officer superintended during the voyage the fitting of the ship for the embarkation of the cargo of mules, but no sooner was that done than the mules were placed in the charge of a subaltern who had been sent out to Naples overland. If an illustration was wanted of the necessity for giving veterinary officers the staff rank that they demand, that is one.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is going back upon the ruling which I gave a short time ago.

*CAPTAIN NORTON: I am merely showing the necessity of putting veterinary officers in charge of the transport of horses and mules at sea. If that is not done a large number of remounts are lost, and the country put to great expense. On the 7th June the "Lake Erie" left London with 350 remounts, and there also a Militia officer had been put in charge of the horses, while the veterinary officer was only held in a minor degree responsible for the health and welfare of the horses. I hope the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War will see the necessity of giving some status to the Army Veterinary Department, in order that the horses during transport at sea to the seat of war may be better cared for than at the present time.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham) said he had visited all the remount establishments in Germany, and had also had the advantage of taking part in two campaigns in South Africa. He therefore could say that no matter what our remount system might have been in this country it would have been wholly impossible for the Government in the present crisis to furnish remounts for the cavalry and mounted infantry in South Africa without having recourse to foreign horses. He could also bear out what the hon. Member for Sheffield had said, that both in the Zulu war and the Transvaal war English horses were found wholly unsuitable. They were unaccustomed to the forage, and became skeletons in a short time after they reached South Africa, and the saddles turned round. In every way foreign horses were much more suitable than English horses. The hon. Member for South-east Essex spoke of having remount depôts in this country, but the expense would be ruinous. It had been carefully calculated that if the Government started remount establishments in this country each horse would cost over £80. The German system was entirely different from what we could possibly carry out here. In Germany a large number of stallions belonging to the Government went about the country, and the Government had the first call on the produce, the foals being all marked. Then the young horses were sent to farms for two years before being drafted into the army. That was a very expensive system, and it would be perfectly ruinous if we were to start stud farms in this country. It was almost impossible to buy horses in this country after they exceeded the age of three or four years, and horses when bought at three years old were not fit to put into the ranks. He suggested to the Under Secretary that there should be a certain number of farms in Ireland where the horses could be sent and kept until they had attained the requisite age. When he was in command of a regiment the commanding officers had to buy all their horses, but in his opinion the present system of remounts worked exceedingly well. He supported the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for War in his remarks, and believed the present system was the best that could be devised.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfar) said he rose for the purpose of asking two questions of the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Vote, the first of which was as to the price of horses. The Under Secretary had stated on a previous occasion that the cost of a horse from Argentina landed at the Cape was £26, while the cost of transport of a horse from this country, excluding the cost of the animal, was £35. That seemed to him a very great difference having regard to the mileage between Argentina and the Cape and London and the Cape. He would be glad of some further explanation on the point. He would also like to know why the first instalment, at any rate, of the Return with regard to transports, which was agreed to by the House as far back as 6th February, had not yet been presented.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said that, as far as he could gather, it was the general opinion of experts that the kind of horse sent to South Africa from this country had not proved adequate to the needs of South Africa. He believed, however, that if the breeders in this country knew what kind of horse was required they would be able to produce it. It was not impossible to breed a stamp of horse with greater stamina, of a coarser kind, to meet the requirements of the Army. He suggested that the Government should send round to the agricultural shows one or two typical animals so that breeders might see what was required. If that were done they would get a cobbler and more bony animal with less blood, which would be more satisfactory. He wished also, in support of the remarks of the hon. Member for Sheffield, to call attention to the matter of regimental baggage. The officers had now to carry about a perfect mass of luggage and furniture because, when they were moved from station to station, the barracks were handed over to them as bare as a cell in a prison. It would, he was sure, be more economical if the barrack rooms were kept decently equipped, and the outlay might be met by charging the officers of each regiment occupying the barracks a reasonable rent. Young officers naturally desired to have as good furniture as their comrades, and went to very great expense in this matter, and he was of opinion if the item of barrack furniture were struck off it would lessen greatly the burden of expense cast on young men joining the Army.

MR. WARNER asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would give some explanation as to how far the War Office had been able to supply the Royal Reserve regiments with horses.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, Ince) was of opinion that horses purchased for the Army at the present time were taken at too young an age. Every horse purchased should be fit for immediate use, which was very far from being the case under the present system.

*GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) said the suggestion made that horses should be purchased in Canada, where the horse used by the farmer was just the horse required for military purposes, owing to the method adopted had not produced good results. He had had some experience of Canada and the methods adopted there. He knew the difficulty of getting horses in England, but the methods adopted in Canada had not been such as would give the best Canadian horse to the British Army. In Canada the remount officers gave notice of their intention to visit a certain place, with the result that the American dealers also attended, and directly a horse was passed as suitable the remount officers were always outbid by the American horsedealer. He suggested that remount officers should not be sent out in this way, but that the horses should be obtained from the producer through a middleman.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member for Lichfield asked whether the Government were considering the advisability of using lighter carts. Yes, Sir; our experience in South Africa has shown us that lighter carts are necessary, and we are now replacing the present cart by a lighter one. With regard to the question as to the horses, I have not by me the exact number of registered horses, but the omnibus horse is a registered horse, and hon. Members will be glad to hear that he has been twice mentioned in despatches. General Sir George Forestier-Walker stated on 13th March, in reply to inquiries, that the Australian cavalry horse and the English omnibus horse were most satisfactory, and in reply to more detailed inquiries he placed horses in the following order of suitability:—Cavalry horses, the large horses—Australian first, English second, best Argentine third; mounted infantry, cobs—Cap. horses first, Indian and Australian second, Argentine third. He also stated that a few Arab horses from India had proved very satisfactory, as well as the English omnibus horse.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Might I ask if a similar report has been received from the front? I take it that report came from the base.

MR. WYNDHAM: The reports sent from the base are reports which come from the front. We get all our reports through the base. Referring to the remarks of the hon. Member for the Lichfield Division, this year, particularly, it has been necessary to place the troops in close proximity to rifle ranges, and I believe great satisfaction has been given to the Auxiliary forces in camp by the fact that they have had no difficulty in that matter. But there is another reason, and, of course, it is also familiar to the hon. Member—namely, that our barracks are only suited to hold regiments of a certain size. The hon. Member asks as to the number of horses already in possession of the Royal Reserve regiments. I have not got the figures with me. I may say, however, that from all these questions it appears that hon. Members do not quite appreciate the fact that these are very young regiments, and that you cannot supply horses until the men are there to groom them. But the average number of men in these regiments is satisfactory, and there is no difficulty in getting horses now as fast as they are needed. I am personally gratified to find that it is possible in this country to get so many horses of the very stamp we need for about £35. My hon. and gallant friend raised an interesting question in regard to the best mode of transport for horses. I do not think I quite agree with him. He referred to the abolition of slings for horses. It is a matter quite open to argument, but the evidence of the recent operations on the sea is not conclusive either way. There have been two bad accidents entailing grievous losses. The accident happened in one case on a vessel fitted on the new model, and the other on a vessel where the fittings were on the old model. It is for the jury to decide, but the change from the slings to the new fittings has been made in view of the practice of the great trading firms who carry an enormous number of horses every year from Argentina, or Australia, to the markets here. They have found that the statistics of losses prove conclusively that the new style of fittings, which allow the horses room fore and aft, are on the whole the best. It has been found that with slings horses are apt to sit down in rough weather for several days together without raising themselves on their hind legs, and that induces serious results. As to the question of baggage that has been raised by the hon. Member for Sheffield and the hon. and gallant Member for the Newport Division, I sympathise very much with the view which they have put forward. I thought my hon. and gallant friend in raising the question, by importing the word "mobility" into his plea, might mislead those who are not closely following the discussion into thinking that we are not attending to mobility for the purposes of war. Of course, that is a totally different thing. This is a plea put in on behalf of the British officer that he should not be put to so great expense as he is at present by being asked to fit up a room from floor to ceiling and then to convey the whole of his goods and chattels at each of the many removals entailed upon him. I am glad that the question has been raised, because some remarks which I let fall earlier in the session upon the urgent need of reducing the cost to his parents of the young officer have been held outside this House to mean that the young officer is as a rule extravagant. I do not think that that is the case. He may be in certain cases extravagant. There may be room for a certain amount of, I shall not say sumptuary legislation, but sumptuary pressure, but in my opinion it must be accompanied by some relief of the burdens which we place upon him. It is not fair to say to the young officer, "You are not to waste your money in this way," and at the same time to force him to devote so large an amount of his private funds to buying his bed, poker, and fender.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: The poker and fender are provided.

MR. WYNDHAM: If we are to have a reform, I think it ought to be a bilateral reform. With the need for sumptuary reform there is a need for greater generosity towards the young officer, who has so many charges placed upon him.

*MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.): The hon. Gentleman has stated that he can get as many horses as he wants. I know a cavalry regiment which has only 200 horses, and I know for a certainty that there are many men in that regiment who were never on a horse. There must be something radically wrong. Why, there are cavalry regiments where there are about three men to every horse. One hon. Gentleman has said that we ought to have two horses to every man. Most of the cavalry officers would be very glad if every man had his horse. There are regiments where recruits are absolutely unable to get a mount at all. If the horses can be got, why are they not got? As to the suggestion that farmers should be subsidised on condition that they sell their three-year-olds at £30, I should be sorry to see that introduced, as the price would be too low for the pick of the young horses. In regard to the supply of horses there is no doubt that we cannot get the supply we require in England at the prices paid. The Austrian horses to which the hon. Gentleman opposite referred are simply half-bred animals similar to those employed in Ireland, and they can be bred much more cheaply. They are light horses, which are used in farm work, and as hon. Members know these mares can go on working to within a few days of foaling. If farmers were to be subsidised in the way proposed they would have to be much more highly subsidised than in Austria if we are to have the same thing here as in Austria. That would add greatly to the Army Estimates. The farmers could not be expected to breed horses in England at the same prices as in

Mr. Wyndham.

Austria or Ireland. I hope that my hon. friend the Under Secretary of State for War if he can get horses in the unlimited manner he describes will see that the necessary supply is obtained.

MR. WARNER: There is no difficulty about getting horses, and therefore the remount system is in no way to blame. The difficulty is that the regiments have not got them. It is the supplying of them to the regiments and the application for them that has gone wrong.

Vote agreed to.

2. £13,100,000, Provisions, Forage, and other Supplies.

COLONEL WELBY pointed out that the present arrangement in regard to the supply of bread and cheese was not satisfactory. He urged that where the provision of bread and cheese was necessary it should be supplied by the Government instead of being paid out of the money which really belonged to the men. All these little things were talked about throughout the country, and they tended more or less to make the Army unpopular.

MR. WARNER stated that according to the regulations for forage allowances the lieutenant-colonel of a regiment received an allowance for his horse, and so did the major when in England, while the second in command had no allowance.

*MR. JEFFREYS: I should like to call attention to the way in which food is passed into the various camps. The meat has to be passed by a subaltern, who generally knows absolutely nothing about the subject. How can he possibly know anything about it, seeing he is not trained for such work? The duty requires men who have been specially trained. At present, a subaltern is told off every day to see whether the meat is good or bad, and he naturally does the work as quickly as possible, as he wants to get away to his own business or amusements. That certainly is not a satisfactory way of examining meat. The men sometimes complain that the meat is not good, and we hear a great many complaints as to its insufficiency. There ought to be a radical change in the way this duty is performed; some properly qualified man should be appointed—either a military man or a civilian. Very often a civilian would do better in this matter, but, at any rate, there ought to be some man with special knowledge of the subject to pass all the meat that goes into camp for the use of the troops. I should like to call attention also to the way in which forage is passed. The forage is brought in in wagons, in which form it is passed by a superior officer. Those wagons are taken into the particular camps, where subalterns are told off to look at the oats or the various trusses of hay, and see whether they are good or bad. Again, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the subaltern has no special knowledge of what forage should be. It is quite a joke amongst contractors that subalterns look at the hay and frequently send back good hay and pass bad. Unless somebody who has a far better knowledge of the subject is told off for this duty we shall not get the troops properly foraged. The Government pay a sum of money sufficient to obtain good forage, and they are supposed to get it, but as long as this duty is detailed to subalterns who know nothing about the matter the present state of things will continue. We have heard to-night about the horses having to carry heavy loads. It would be a great deal better for the horses if they had good forage. No horse can work hard on bad forage. These are the two points I desired to bring before my hon. friend. First of all, I would ask him to make a change in the way in which meat for the troops is passed into camp; and, secondly, I would strongly urge him to appoint inspectors with a special knowledge of the subject to pass or reject the forage necessary for the horses.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somersetshire, Wellington) drew attention to the large increases in the amount allotted in the Estimates under this Vote for the purpose of sweeping chimneys, and "lime and other contingent expenses." He could understand how the increase with regard to the latter, which was three times the amount of last year, might occur, but he could not see why the amount for sweeping chimneys should be four times the amount of last year.

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.): I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman a question with regard to the item, "allowances to wives and children of soldiers when separated from them."

There is, first of all, the case, which is a very hard one, and which the War Office has promised to consider, but with regard to which we have not yet had any definite answer, namely, that of the man who has married without leave. My hon. friend is probably aware that the allowance is paid to the wives of all the men who have married with leave, and are on the strength of the regiment. It is also paid to the wives of all Reservists who are called upon to rejoin the colours. The only class who do not receive the separation allowance from the War Office are the wives of the men who have married without leave. Whatever reason there may be during time of peace for not recognising these women as legally married, there can surely be no reason for not doing so when the husbands are away on active service. I think my hon. friend will admit that, whatever may be said as to the necessity of maintaining discipline in the Army, no question of discipline can really enter into consideration when it is a case of the wife of a man serving his country at the front. There is also another point. Some few weeks ago I put a question to the Financial Secretary to the War Office with regard to the payment of separation allowances to the wives of the wounded. I was then informed that the War Office were paying those allowances, but the hon. Member could not say how long that practice was to be continued. I think my hon. friend will admit that it is but fair that those concerned should know whether the War Office intend to continue to pay these allowances, and, if so, for how long. There is one other case I have to bring forward, to which I am sure my hon. friend will listen sympathetically, and I hope he will be able to agree with the view I am going to put before him. I want to ask whether the War Office cannot consider the very hard case of the mothers of many of the Reservists who are called up. I may be told that it is very difficult to draw a line of demarcation, and that you must draw the line at a man's wife. But I do think that the War Office might well consider whether they could not pay to these mothers, if not the same as to the wives, at all events a smaller separation allowance during the time their sons are at the front. When these Reservists are called upon to rejoin the colours it frequently causes the loss of the means of subsistence as far as the mother is concerned, and the War Office might well consider this matter. My hon. friend has been most kind in regard to cases I have brought before him, but I am now referring to the general policy, because when individual cases are brought before the authorities they always say they cannot go outside the instructions which the Secretary of State has given. I therefore hope that my hon. friend will be willing favourably to consider the three points I have brought forward, and assure us that, if not in the case of the present war, at all events should we be unfortunately engaged in any future war these matters will not be overlooked.

*GENERAL SIR F. W. FITZ WYGRAM (Hampshire, Fareham) was understood to suggest that all cavalry officers should in every second year of their service be sent for a week or ten days to Aldershot for a thorough instruction in forage at the veterinary school. There is the school, and it ought to be made more useful than it is.

MAJOR RASCH: I should like to say a word with regard to the subalterns passing meat. It is quite true that the subaltern frequently knows very little about it, but the quartermaster who is with him knows a good deal, and the odds are that he knows rather too much. In reference to forage, I think that if the curriculum of young officers who are trying for admission included, instead of the useless nonsense now to be found, the study of a book such as that written by the hon. Baronet below me, on horses and forage—a book which is about the best of its kind that I have read—it would remove much of the ignorance which is sometimes found in officers in regard to hay, oats, and straw. Perhaps I might be permitted to say half a dozen words with reference to the meat ration. Three-quarters of a pound is too little. The addition of a quarter of a pound means—I think it was so stated some time ago—something like a quarter of a million of money per year, but when from three-quarters of a pound of meat you take away the bone and fat—and no soldier with any respect for himself, as everybody knows, will eat fat if he can help it—there is brought down to the size of a small sausage, and that really is not enough for a growing man. I have been told that a horse master brought a horse to exist on one straw a day, and I think the experiment of giving the British soldier three-quarters of a pound of meat—which, when cooked, is rather less than half a pound—is really more or less in the same direction.

MR. STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman can give us any explanation of why practically the whole of the hay which has been used during the present war has been obtained from Argentina or elsewhere abroad. I remember the answer of the Financial Secretary to the War Office, that he could not state the price paid, and also that there were difficulties as to transport and the cost of transport. But I think we should have some explanation of why large sums of money have been expended abroad when it is quite possible that that money might have been spent in this country. I can assure the hon. Gentleman there is a great deal of dissatisfaction amongst farmers in this country, especially in the west of England, with the way in which the Government, to a very large extent, have ignored them in regard to the purchase of hay for our horses in South Africa; and I hope the hon. Gentleman will think it worth while to give us some explanation.

MR. WYNDHAM: My hon. and gallant friend the Member for Taunton raised the question of the refreshments supplied to the troops, and he took exception to the fact that such provisions had to be paid for out of the canteen accounts. That goes to the root of the whole policy of providing for the soldier, and another part of the same question has been raised by the hon. and gallant Member for South-east Essex, who stated that the meat ration is insufficient. All those who are conversant with the matter know that the ration at home is 1lb. of bread and $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of meat, which is increased to 1lb. when the troops are under canvas. But in addition to that a clear 3d. has been given for messing, and the canteen system turns upon the way practically in which the soldiers manage and finance for themselves the amount of money which is pooled and which is derived from that source. Many of the hon. Members who have taken part in this discussion have been to Aldershot, and they know the conditions under which the soldiers live. But those hon. Members who have not been to Aldershot have no idea of the amount of money which has been sunk by the public in canteen and recreation rooms. There are theatres for sing-songs and other entertainments; there are rooms for recreation and games, with libraries attached, and the whole of this fabric is earning money for the soldier. The officers take a good deal of interest in the conduct of these places, the accounts are audited for nothing, and a great deal of money can be made, thanks to the supplies and assistance which are voted by this House. It is out of the money so made that the soldier provides himself with the meals which are really necessary in view of the ration which is given. I am not prepared to argue whether the change suggested would be better or not, for I prefer to give no opinion upon it; but I am anxious that the system should be thoroughly understood. I think that there is a great deal of misapprehension as to the breakfast of the soldier. The hon. Member for Lichfield asked me a question about the officer in command which it is impossible to follow across the floor of the House. As to the remarks made by the hon. Member for the Basingstoke Division, he contends that every officer in the Army ought to be an expert on the quality of the food supplied to the men and of the forage supplied to the horses, and he advocates the employment of civilian experts.

*MR. JEFFREYS: I said civilians or soldiers.

MR. WYNDHAM: My contention is that every officer in the Army ought to be an expert on the quality of food supplied to his men and the quality of the forage supplied to his horses. I listened with great interest to the speech made by the hon. and gallant Member for the Fareham Division, and I feel sure that in the cavalry regiment with which he was connected any young officer who did not know good forage from bad would have received very short shrift from him. If this is true in regard to forage, it is equally true with regard to food. The point, however, is one of regimental discipline, and I am convinced that in any well administered regiment there is very little room for the abuses suggested by the hon. Member. A good commanding officer would no doubt have his meat properly inspected while a bad commanding officer would probably fail in that respect. The hon. and gallant Baronet has asked why the items of barrack expenditure have increased so much, and why they are higher than hitherto. The barracks have never been fuller in the history of this century than during the last month, and the greater expense is a necessary consequence. The hon. Member for the South-west Division of Manchester has brought up a question in which he has taken so great an interest, for he has made himself the champion of the dependents of our soldiers who are fighting abroad, and personally I thank him for the interest he has taken in this subject. But as the hon. Member has hinted, it is not possible to alter the basis of the whole system of allowances. The allowance he refers to is given in lieu of rations in the married quarters, and that is why it is given to the wife when the husband is separated from her. The theory that the Government should provide lodging, food, and fuel for all the dependents of our Army is a proposition which we could not entertain. I think my hon. friend will see that it would be extremely difficult for the War Office to undertake what he has indicated. The only other question raised is the one put forward by the hon. Member for South Somerset, who asks why so much hay has been bought out of this country. I do not know whether the hon. Member was present during the debate in regard to the purchase of remounts, but precisely the same principle underlies the purchase of hay which must underlie the purchase of all articles for our Army. We must get the best article at the most moderate price, and it is a fact that you can get hay from Canada and other places which is considered to be the very best forage for this campaign at a price infinitely lower than you can get hay, as a rule in small quantities, from individual farmers in this country. I am sure the hon. Member would be the last person to say that we should use this great emergency as an occasion to benefit one class, and we must regard it as a business transaction.

MR. STRACHEY: Will the hon. Gentleman state what the price per ton was of the hay bought in Argentina?

MR. WYNDHAM: It was very much less than the price of English hay.

MR. STRACHEY: I quite admit the force of what the hon. Gentleman has said, but the Government have repeatedly refused to say what price they have been paying for hay. It has been stated that they have paid as much as £8 or £10 a ton abroad when they could buy the best hay at half that price at home.

MR. JEFFREYS: The statement made by my hon. friend that the cost of English hay would be £4 or £5 a ton more has quite convinced me that the purchases made were the most economical. It is a fact that shipowners do not like to carry hay because it is likely to set on fire. It is also a very bulky article, and the cost of the carriage out there is double what the hay costs here. My hon. friend said that the soldiers ought to be able to tell good forage from bad. The fact is that they do not know how to inspect forage. Perhaps they knew it twenty years ago, but they do not know it now. They are not instructed in it, and they do not inspect the forage in a proper way. I did not advocate that civilians should inspect it, but I said that somebody, either civilians or soldiers, should inspect it, and what I hoped that my hon. friend would say was that he would see that the forage was properly inspected. I think that in this most important duty of inspecting not only meat, but forage, some instruction should be given.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said that when the Government of Bombay had to supply the Army in Egypt with enormous quantities of forage, the best forage was found to be that which was purchased in Austria.

COLONEL WELBY said that in regard to the inspection of meat, he had known butchers to differ as to the quality, and one of the best means he knew of obtaining good meat for a regiment was to put the butcher into the water cart.

*GENERAL LAURIE: There is one point which has not been satisfactorily answered by the Under Secretary, it is as to the increase of the meat ration. I am aware that as he stated messing allowance has been given, but that was intended to provide the soldier with an evening meal instead of requiring him to provide it out of his own pocket. The question has become more urgent now than in former times, because then we had a comparatively small number of young recruits in a company composed mostly of grown men. The old soldier did not use all his allowance, so that a surplus went to the young lad, for whom the ration was not sufficient. We are now talking about getting three years soldiers, and that means that we must have more growing lads. If so, then we must give them enough food to make them into healthy and strong men, and the meat rations ought to be increased.

Vote agreed to.

3. £4,680,000, Clothing Establishments and Services.

SIR J. FERGUSSON said he thought that something ought to be said upon this Vote about that great defect which had been so painfully illustrated last week at Aldershot. He alluded to the practice of exercising the soldiers in very hot weather such as they had recently experienced without any proper covering to their head. At Aldershot many soldiers fell out of the ranks, many were taken to the hospital, and a certain number died. It was common knowledge that an enormous number of men fell out of the ranks during the manoeuvres last Monday week. Four of the men had died, and his contention was that those lives need not have been lost, and those casualties need not have occurred at all had the men been properly equipped. We were sending men out to drill year after year in the extremely hot sun without any better covering to their heads than that absurd garment known as the forage cap, which some people called "smart." In his opinion the forage cap was a useless and ridiculous head-dress. The forage cap was much too small to keep off the sun, and it had to be worn cocked on one ear. He did not see why the smartness of the British Army should depend upon having a very small hat cocked on one side of the head. The German soldiers and the soldiers of other nations wore hats with a good broad top to keep the sun off their heads, and why the British soldier should be bound to wear a little hat stuck over one ear he could not understand. In India such a thing would not be allowed for a moment, for there they took very good care that the head was covered. He thought that it almost amounted to a crime that soldiers should be sent out on a hot summer day, wearing forage caps, simply to be struck down by sunstroke. He could not conceive why the War Office had not long ago adopted a more sensible cap.

COLONEL WELBY thought the explanation of the wearing of forage caps at Aldershot was to be found in the fact that it was necessary to clearly distinguish the troops during the manœuvres. The soldiers were very much alike, and if they had not worn their forage caps there would have been no distinguishing mark at all. He was perfectly certain that it would be found that the reason the forage caps were worn was simply to enable the forces to be distinguished at some distance from each other. They all knew that at Aldershot things would get terribly mixed up during these manœuvres if all the forces were dressed exactly the same. Allusion had been made to the necessity of providing a proper forage cap. They had had many new forage caps, but none of them were really of any practical service. It was a remarkable thing that they never saw anything designed by the War Office in common use, for they were generally patterns forced upon the soldier. He could not understand why a proper forage cap could not be designed. His own belief was that the one worn by the German soldiers was the most practical. He knew that they did not like to copy other nations, but still there was a great deal to be said in favour of them from a practical point of view. He had been informed that the helmet served out to the troops had proved very unserviceable in South Africa. For one thing, the men could not lie down comfortably wearing it. The only practical head-dress in South Africa was the soft hat worn by the Yeomanry and City of London Volunteers. There were some difficulties in regard to a provision of a practical head-dress, but he hoped the changes to be introduced into the Army, arising out of the experiences obtained in the war, would include the provision of good practical head-dresses which would afford proper protection from the hot sun.

LORD EDWARD MANNERS (Leicestershire, Melton) said he agreed with the remarks of his hon. and gallant friend as to the extremely unsuitable character of the forage cap. The helmet which was issued to the infantry of the Line at home fitted too close to the temples, and had no brim to afford protection to the eyes and the temples from the sun. Besides this the helmets were extremely uncomfortable, and those supplied to the London police were much better and of a more practical shape. He fully endorsed the remarks which had been made by his hon. and gallant friend as to the extremely unsuitable character of the forage cap, and he hoped that steps would be taken to provide the soldiers not only with a good forage cap, but also with a more suitable full-dress head-gear.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I very much question whether the intelligence of the War Office is capable of devising an ordinary rational suit of clothes for the British soldier. The hon. and gallant Gentleman alluded to fashion, and said some caps were not liked because they were not smart enough. Are we to sacrifice everything, even the lives of our soldiers, to fashion? It is perfectly possible to invent a rational head-dress for the British soldier. The British Army is the only one in the world which has not got such a head-dress. Why does not the hon. Gentleman take an example from the Navy? The Navy cap is very much like the cap worn by the German soldier, and there is nothing smarter. Let the hon. Gentleman take courage and put his foot down and override all these questions of taste, smartness, and fashion. I do not know anything more ridiculous than a Guardsman walking about London with a little tin pot perched on one ear. You cannot lie down comfortably in it, and when a man stands up he appears to my mind a semi-idiot. It is the most ludicrous head-gear ever put on the head of a human being. For the undress forage cap the sailor shows the way. He looks smart in it, and there is no reason why a cap of essentially the same pattern in either red or blue cloth should not be given to the soldier. As to the full dress cap, there is the large slouch hat tied up on one side which is used in Australia and South Africa. It is the hat which the Cavaliers wore when they fought the Roundheads, and which the Roundheads wore when they fought the Cavaliers with such vigour and effect. It is essentially an English invention, and if the hon. Gentleman or the Commander-in-Chief wants to add a little millinery to it, there are ostrich feathers, cocks' feathers, gold lace, and buttons, and whatever is done to it, it will not cease to be comfortable and workmanlike. That is the hat for the British Army. Let us go back to the seventeenth century, and take the hat worn by our great-great-grandfathers. As to the forage cap, the sailor's cap is practical and useful. He uses it in all sorts of climates; he does his work in it, and goes aloft in it, and practically it has never been found to fail. It will, therefore, be to the credit of the War Office, now that a number of men have been killed through their incapacity, if they go back to the Navy for a suitable cap, and to the last century for a full dress head-gear.

MR. WYNDHAM: This subject lends itself, no doubt, to humorous treatment. It is easy to be amused over the eccentricities of costume which have been the theme of the satirists of every age, but the subject comes before us to-day because of a most melancholy catastrophe, to which I have alluded once before. I can assure every hon. Member in this Committee that no one feels more deeply than I do how deplorable it is to have to chronicle the deaths of four men at our own doors at Aldershot in addition to the men who are dying day by day in South Africa. The War Office is approaching this subject in all seriousness, and every step has been taken to see that such an occurrence shall not take place again. I would prefer not to go into the question as to the exact distribution of blame between individuals for the death of these four men. No one is more deeply sensible of their loss than those who directly or indirectly may have contributed to the catastrophe. I could adduce a number of reasons to show that although there may have been negligence there had not been what I might call culpable negligence of such a character as to justify this Committee in taking action when action has already been taken. Although it may not appear so to civilians, I think every soldier in the Committee will agree with me that for the Commander-in-Chief to intervene in a divisional command and to publicly notify his regret that certain things had happened and to direct that they shall not occur again is a rebuke of a very practical and severe character, and I may add that the directions sent to Aldershot have been repeated in identical terms to all the other commands where there are numbers of troops in camp. Our duty ought to be to take steps of a practical kind, and not to try and fix blame on this or that individual.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: No one said a word about individuals.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, but I cannot altogether ignore what takes place outside. I think there has been regrettable criticism outside this House on the part of people who, unlike the service Members of this Committee, are not competent to decide who is responsible, and they frequently make grave errors and inflict cruel injustice on deserving officers who are in no way to blame. I now come to the question of the clothing of the British Army. A great deal of criticism has been offered regarding the forage cap. Let us admit it is not a good cap, but my point is that you should not expect a cap to do duty for a hat. I think that it is better that we should concentrate our attention on two forms of head-dress—namely, a cap and a hat, rather than on the question of turning a cap into a hat or a hat into a cap. That has been at the bottom of many of our errors in the past. The cap ought to be worn in the early morning or in the evening when duty is over. Then it is said that it does not protect from the sun, and an attempt is made to make it like the hat. The hat must be of some weight and resistance if it is to be a protection from rain and sun, but then it is said, "It is too heavy; let us try and make it like the cap." What we want is to get either a cap or a hat. When we come to the question of a hat we are face to face with difficulties not entirely connected with fashion or mode. How many head-dresses are there in the British Army? and how many corps are prepared to give up their own head-dress? Will the Scotch Greys give up their bearskins or the Highlanders their bonnets? Then we have busbies, astrachan helmets, Highland bonnets, and different kinds of helmets, and you cannot lay a finger on any one of these articles of head-gear without really damaging the sentimental traditions of some particular corps. It is not a question of mere fashion. I am often amused at some of the criticisms heard on this subject. In one capacity the commonsense critic says, "Why not adopt a plain, sensible head-gear?" but in his other capacity as a proud parent of a young son in a crack corps he asks, "Why destroy the head-dress of that corps which was perhaps worn at Fontenoy or in other battles more than one hundred years ago!" We cannot afford to ignore that altogether. It is part of the capital on which we run our army. It might be said that this or that was a ridiculous hat. So it might be, but it reminds the men who are in the corps at the present day of things which are of great value to them and of great value to the nation in securing troops under the voluntary system. I am not prepared to defend the forage cap, but the cap was not intended, and ought not to be intended, and was not designed as a protection from the sun. The fact of it is, that to wear a cap under a hot sun is a mistake. I am prepared to confess that we have not a full supply of full head-gear for all the troops. I make that confession, and I do not think it reflects in the least on the Department or the Director General. We have sent out an immense number of different kinds of helmets to South Africa, and we can only get a limited number from the manufacturers in this country who are sometimes themselves interfered with by the trades union connected with that manufacture, who object to the use of apprentices, and so on. Our path is full of difficulties. We have sent this enormous number of helmets to South Africa, and the result is that a portion of our forces at home are for the present without helmets. The lesson to be learnt is that we must in future have a far greater reserve of such stores than we ever had before, and that is part of the policy of the Government. Now we are aware of what ought to be done and we intend to do it. As I said we cannot expect from the manufacturers all the head-gear we require for the moment, therefore as an emergency measure we are prepared to at once issue, without prejudice as to what finally the head-dress of the Army ought or will be, 52,000 light canvas slouch hats for the Militia and Royal Reserves which have to be drilled. We can get a large quantity of this class of head-gear, but it is not to be taken as the final form of the slouch hat. Let me put another consideration before the Committee. Many Militia corps are affiliated to Scotch regiments. Are we to supply them with the feather bonnet? Why should we sink an enormous amount of money in that class of head-gear? It costs more than the helmet, though it lasts longer; but who is going to stow them away for eleven months out of twelve, when they should last about 144 years, and become a kind of stud for moths. It will be seen, therefore, that the matter is not so easy as it may seem. We are feeling our way towards securing a suitable head-dress for the whole Army. A smart head-dress, which I would prefer to call the traditional head-dress of the regiment, will be provided for full-dress and holiday occasions to remind the men of the history of their regiments, and, in addition, there will be a workmanlike head-dress to be worn by regiments in any part of the Empire or out of the Empire. On that we have been at work for a long time. Sometimes we have been criticised and laughed at for taking so long at the War Office, but it would be a great mistake and a fatal error to decide on a new head-dress that would not be acceptable to the soldier. That would throw back this reform for years. We cannot force these things on the Army, but the reform can be effected if we secure an article which will be satisfactory, and I hope that that will be obtained without any great delay. We have got to consider tint, texture and weight, and as between tint, texture and weight we have to strike a mean suitable to the climate of this country and South Africa.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN :

The hon. Gentleman has in a most interesting and eloquent way laid down certain principles which are very useful to the Committee. The Committee should bear in mind all the difficulties in the way of securing a uniform and practical head-dress for almost every condition in a soldier's career. I think, however, the hon. Gentleman is aiming at too much if he thinks he can find a head-dress which will suit every climate to which the British soldier may be sent. The great difficulty in our Army is that we never know where a soldier may be employed, and under what conditions. As to the question of head-dress, I confess at once that I think that the present difficulty is mainly owing to the slight which was put some years ago by a countryman of mine, on the Glengarry cap. Then the present cap was invented. I am not quite sure whether it was not adopted when I was at the War Office, but I do not think my heart approved of it, even though my hand did. I believe it was the result of long cogitation and experiment, and was supposed to be very successful. There is one point with regard to head-dress which ought to be remembered. A cap is not likely to be very successful if it is not worn on the place where a cap ought to be worn. If a cap is worn on the nose or on the back of the head it is not much good to the top of the head, and I think that the exaggerated angle at which the British soldier is apparently encouraged, for the sake of a smart appearance, to wear his cap, is the cause of many of the evils attributed to the cap itself. I think hon. Members will recognise the difficulties connected with this matter if they consider the great difficulty they themselves experience in finding a suitable head-gear for their own use. The question is not by any means as simple as it looks. There is the ordinary silk hat, of which I am an advocate myself, but I have read columns and columns in the newspapers attacking and defending it, and it is certainly a debatable point whether it is good or not. For the purposes of a more free and easy life the universal practice now is to wear a cloth cap close to the head, which has always seemed to me, although comfortable, to be one of the hottest head-dresses anyone can wear. We change about ourselves from one kind to another, and there is no necessity for uniformity in our case. We have plenty of ingenious people in the shops who provide us with what we want, though I doubt if any hon. Member finds any one of the head-dresses usually sold for use in private life a really good head-dress. Therefore the difficulty connected with finding a suitable head dress for the soldier—who is not so free, and who has more strict conditions imposed upon him—is not at all surprising. An hon. Member spoke, very properly I think, of the necessity of considering the traditions of the Army and those little peculiarities and customs which are commonly associated with great events in the past. No one can attribute anything of that kind to the helmet or cap of the present day. Both are the creations of our own time. Now the hon. Gentleman has told us that the War Office is engaged, and has been for some time engaged, in considering this question. I only hope that he will apply the excellent rule he has laid down to-night. I think the War Office is sure to come to grief in its efforts if it attempts to do too much, or if it thinks that absolute uniformity can be applied to all the circumstances, climates, and conditions under which the British soldier serves.

MR. WARNER: I have worn all these caps, and I think that the worst of them all was the hard cap. The War Office is to blame for not having supplied the Royal Reserve regiments and certain of the Militia regiments with some similar head-dress. The Under Secretary for War has stated that it was impossible to provide a suitable head-dress for all cases, but he might have supplied a head-dress for drilling in the sun. If the troops at Aldershot had had slouch hats the sad accidents that happened there would not have occurred. I want to draw attention to a question which was the subject of a serious debate in another place, where there was a consensus of opinion that the War Office were doing wrong. I allude to the practice of putting Militiamen into old cast clothes. That is not the way to get good recruits for the Militia. It is said that the Militiaman gets one new suit of clothes. That is hardly the case. He gets one which may be new or partly worn, and one that is not fit to be put on; and this he has to wear for years. I hope the War Office will take into serious consideration the subject of giving the Militiamen at least one decent suit of clothes instead of the old worn things which they get at present. It is a perfect disgrace and a hardship to have to put such clothes on, although I believe it is quite true that they have been boiled and cleaned and made wholesome. A similar complaint may be made against the accoutrements. I saw the other day some what were called valises, which were to a certain extent serviceable, but they did not match the others in the regiment. They had been worn by another regiment, were at least twenty years old, and had been sent down to replace those that were falling to pieces. In the same way worn-out rifles are served out. I hope that some more care will be taken in supplying Militiamen with new clothes, new accoutrements, and new rifles.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I am very glad to hear that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War is paying some attention to the clothing of the Army, and that the soldier is to be supplied with one smart suit for full-dress occasions, and another to wear when work is to be done. The Under Secretary speaks of historical uniforms, but I should say that in future sentiment will run in favour of loose tunics which will recall the glorious deeds in South Africa. I am sure that the young ladies would be better pleased to see their sweethearts and brothers dressed with some reasonable relation to the work which they are called upon to do. Reference has been made to the tight tunics and tight stocks of old days which destroyed the soldiers' health. I remember a Committee upstairs which investigated this matter. In those old times the tunics were so tight that the heart was affected, and the soldiers were attacked by diseases which were despaired of by the Army doctors. Since then the clothing of the soldier has been much more sensible, and irritable heart and aneurisms, and all that class of cases directly due to the cramping caused by the tight tunic and stock have almost entirely disappeared. If you give soldiers a sensible dress their health will increase in due proportion. The "man in the street," who is a man of common-sense, has a right to expect that common-sense will direct the movement of troops at Aldershot and other parts of the world. I am glad that my hon. friend has taken a grave view of the sad affair at Aldershot. The serious results of sunstroke are not to be measured by the number of deaths. There are many cases in which the man never says anything about it. But a man who has had sunstroke is never safe; it affects him for the rest of his life; and he is easily upset in a variety of ways, familiar to those who have travelled in tropical climates. When I was about to travel in the tropics twelve years ago, the first thing I did was to go to a friend who had experience and ask him what precautions I ought to take. He said the only danger was from the sun striking the head, and the best thing to do was to put up an umbrella whenever the sun came out. This I did, and I was all right. If men do not put on a proper head-dress when the sun is blazing, they are bound to get sunstroke. I would ask my hon. friend the Under Secretary if he will lay on the Table of the House the results of the full inquiry that has been made into these sad events at Aldershot, of the gravity of which the hon. Gentleman has taken a very proper view. I am sure that that would relieve apprehension and remove misconception.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): My hon. friend seems to lay the entire blame of what happened at Aldershot on the War Office, for the want of sun helmets. I rise merely to say, in one sentence, that I am personally acquainted with certain cases where the regimental officers made a request for sun helmets, and the War Office made no difficulty in supplying sun helmets or slouch hats.

MR. SCOTT-MONTAGU (Hampshire, New Forest): I wish to give my experience of the heat wave on the field day at Aldershot, and some ideas of mine as to how unfortunate occurrences of this kind may be avoided in future. It is quite true that an excessive heat wave came on in the middle of the day, which no amount of prevision could have anticipated except a previous communication with the clerk of the weather. I attribute the cases of sunstroke on that day to the fact that neither a helmet nor a suitable head-dress for a hot day was provided. I am certain that if any soldier in the Army or Reserve force were asked, he would say that the helmet, as at present designed, is not a suitable head-dress. It is almost impossible to shoot with precision in it. If I had to choose between helmet and forage cap, I would prefer the forage cap, which is much more comfortable. On that particular day it was necessary that the Aldershot force should march a longer distance than the eastern force, but even in the latter a large number suffered from the heat, although they wore helmets. The best solution of the problem would be the provision of a head-dress similar to that given to the various irregular corps we lately sent out to South Africa. It is a great mistake to say that the sun in England is less powerful than in South Africa. I have felt the sun on Salisbury Plain far harder and more trying than I ever did in South Africa. Therefore, when my hon. friend is designing the cap of the future, he should design something soft, and which will not necessarily obscure the vision, as the helmet does.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Under the adroit management of the Under Secretary for War we have drifted into a discussion of the best military head-dress of the future. While I admire this adroitness, I think we should have some sort of explanation as to who is responsible for what took place at Aldershot. As a matter of fact some soldiers died, and a great many suffered from sunstroke. How did that occur? A large number of men were taken out to manoeuvre, when the thermometer was above 90 degrees and a hot sun was shining, without practically any covering to their heads, and made to march great distances. Someone must have been responsible. The hon. Gentleman says that there was no culpable negligence. I do not know what he means by culpable negligence. I do not suppose that any officer went out with the intention to destroy life; but there was negligence, and that negligence was palpably culpable. This is not the first time it has occurred. We have had like stories before, and each time we have been told that something is to be done in the future. I want to know who is responsible. The hon. Gentleman says the War Office sent an enormous quantity of helmets abroad, and consequently there were none at Aldershot.

MR. WYNDHAM: There were none in reserve.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes; but if that be the case some general or commander is responsible for what has occurred. After all, we credit a general with some modicum of common-sense which we civilians have; and we know that if we send men out to walk a long distance when the sun is shining, without any head-covering, there will be some accident. I should like to know whether some officer at Aldershot should not have the right to say: "The day is unsuited to take these men out for a very long march, and therefore they should stay at home, or the effect will be the sickness of a great many men." I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman that we ought not to ask who is responsible, but ought only to discuss what is to be a fitting head-dress for our soldiers in the future. I daresay there may be some soldiers who take a great pleasure in having a very bad and uncomfortable hat because the like was worn at the battle of Minden. But the world has progressed since that battle, and probably the latest hat is the best under all the circumstances. But that is not the question of the moment. I want to know what are the powers of the Commanding Officer at Aldershot, and how it was that that commanding officer, knowing what the heat of the day was, did not prevent that march.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member for Lichfield has brought forward a question that has been urged in the House before by himself, and also by the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigtonshire—namely, the great desire on the part of the officers of Militia that their men should have new clothing.

MR. WARNER: I said they should have at least one suit of new clothes.

MR. WYNDHAM: I will not argue the question again, but I may say that the Militiamen gets two suits which, theoretically, have to last in wear seven months in ordinary times; whereas the regular soldier gets two suits and a tunic which have to last two years.

MR. WARNER: They are made of different cloth.

MR. WYNDHAM: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that the clothes ought to last at least more than one or two trainings. It is clear that to give a brand-new outfit in each case would entail a great cost compared with that of the Regular Army. In my own mind, and that of Lord Lansdowne, the plan of issuing old clothes to the Militia has been pushed much too far, and a remedy for that grievance has been considered. But hon. Members will remember that at the beginning of the session I had to withdraw any permanent proposals with regard to the Militia. I trust, however, that Lord Lansdowne may be in a position, after the experience of this summer, to arrive at a conclusion in regard to the matter before the end of the session. The other speeches have turned on the casualties at Aldershot. I have really nothing to add to what I have already said. The hon. Member was not in the House when I gave a narration of the facts. Directly the heat came on the "cease fire" was sounded, and the men were ordered home. But it was then too late. When I put forward all the facts I am sometimes accused of representing that such a catastrophe was inevitable.

I did not say that at all. I say that such an occurrence can be avoided, but only by experience and practice. With the Royal Reservists and many new Militia battalions and new officers, it is impossible to expect that everything will go as well as when some one General has commanded a division for three or four years in succession. It is not fair, in such circumstances, to pick out for blame one officer who has done his best, and say, "You, and you alone are responsible." The War Office is responsible certainly for having followed the policy of many years in not having a large supply of 150,000 helmets in store. We did not adopt that policy, nor did our predecessors; and I do not believe that anyone without the experience of South Africa would have questioned the policy we did adopt.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I would like to ask just one question as to the sanitary arrangements of the Royal Clothing Factory. For some time past the work-people have made complaints of the shocking state of these arrangements.

MR. WYNDHAM: On a point of order. Might not this matter come better under the Barracks Vote?

Vote agreed to.

4. £8,000,000, Warlike and other Stores: Supply and Repair.

MR. WARNER: I wish to ask a question on the state of the rifles throughout the country. I know the difficulty at the present time of supplying rifles and replacing those that are worn out. But many of the rifles given to troops that may be sent abroad any day are quite worn out, and some of them are obsolete.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD: I wish to call attention to the grievance felt very strongly by soldiers who have deductions made from their pay in connection with what is called barrack damages. I have a note from an officer in command of a battalion 900 strong in South Africa, who had served upon him a demand for one penny! That demand was sent 6,500 miles, all the way to Bloemfontein, and sent back the other 6,500 miles, and the sum of one penny has to be divided between 900 men! I have seen another demand for a halfpenny, which has also travelled the 13,000 miles involved in the journey to and from South Africa, and yet another for 2s. 6d., which has to be divided amongst five regiments! It is comforting to know that while we are spending so many millions on the war the War Office authorities are economising in regard to pence. This is, though small, a serious grievance.

MR. BROWN (Shropshire, Wellington) said he had heard that the ambulance wagons were not at all what they might be expected to be, and he suggested that experiments should be made with the object of securing a more convenient wagon, and one which could be more easily drawn.

MR. F. W. WILSON (Norfolk, Mid) said it would greatly assist the formation of rifle clubs if rifles and a certain number of rounds of ammunition were granted to members on more favourable terms than at present.

CAPTAIN NORTON asked the Under Secretary for War whether he had considered the possibility of utilising the large number of Mauser rifles which were coming into our hands in South Africa, and also some part of the ammunition which had not been destroyed, for the benefit of rifle clubs. Even if it were not considered advisable to give the rifles for nothing, the members of rifle clubs might be allowed to purchase them at a small cost.

MR. ALLAN (Gateshead) asked the Under Secretary where the War Office was purchasing its field guns. Twelve months ago the Financial Secretary to the War Office, in reply to a question put by him, said that the authorities were converting some of their present field pieces into so-called quick-firing guns, and also that they had under consideration a quick-firing field piece, which, no doubt, would be the best—as usual. But from that day to this we knew nothing as to who was making these guns. He asked, therefore, who was making these guns, and where they were being made, and why this great increase was necessary; also, whether the guns were made in this country or abroad; whether they were our own design; whether they were converted guns, converted from the old slow-firing field pieces, or whose design they were. He respectfully put these questions to the hon. Gentleman, and would like to have an answer thereto.

MR. WYNDHAM: Not only the guns, but in the stores we shall receive at the termination of the war, there will be many articles in a much worn condition, and that undoubtedly will necessitate their replacement by others which we hope will be an improvement. We hope to profit by our new experience. A great part of our ambulance stores went to South Africa, and it has been found desirable for the future to build lighter ambulance wagons for use on rough ground. With regard to the small claims, as soon as the War Office discovered the system they stopped it as far as possible; but you must have a method in these matters, but in every system there should be a certain amount of elasticity. Rifles and ammunition are supplied to rifle clubs at the cost of production, and cannot be supplied cheaper. The gun licence has also been withdrawn upon all rifles belonging to rifle clubs, and beyond that we are not prepared to go. It is not the intention of the Government to supply those clubs with rifles free when the wants of the Army and the Volunteers have to be attended to. With regard to field guns, as to which the hon. Member for Gateshead asked a series of categorical questions, I do not think I ought to say where they are being purchased, but as to the type of gun, I think I can show him in a few words the type of gun we shall get. The new guns which have been ordered embody all the latest improvements, some of which come from the type of one manufacturer, say Vickers, and others were evolved at Woolwich. This gun would fire eight rounds per minute instead of five, and we only ordered a sufficient number for six or seven batteries of horse artillery and thirty-six batteries of field artillery. This will afford an experiment on a large scale, and if the gun turns out to be the best that money can buy, the artillery will be armed with it.

MR. ALLAN again asked whether the guns were being made in this country or purchased from abroad. Was the War Office still in the arena of experiment with field guns for the Army, and would the right hon. Gentleman say upon what ground he based the expenditure of £802,000 of public money in this way?

MR. WYNDHAM: I have already answered these questions. I am not prepared to go into details on the subject; but the majority of the guns have been ordered from manufacturers in this country, and some from the arsenal at Woolwich. When the hon. Member asks if the War Office is still in the arena of experiment, my answer is that they always are and always will be.

CAPTAIN NORTON: Will the rifle clubs be allowed to purchase the Mauser rifles, thousands of which are now coming into our hands in South Africa, at a reasonable price?

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) said he would like to ask two questions. The Vote before the Committee was to provide for current wants, and he wished to know whether the War Office fixed a standard of reserve with regard to the various armaments and equipment which should always be maintained. He presumed a reserve was kept, but he wished to know whether these items under discussion meant that when an extra strain was put upon the country our reserve of armaments and equipment entirely disappeared. He asked the question in order to afford the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of an explanation. The reserve cavalry regiments had been lamentably deficient in saddlery if he could trust the information which he had received, and which had come from well-informed sources. The second point he wished to refer to was the growing expenditure by the War Office for boats and vessels. That appeared to him to be more a matter for the Admiralty, but he noticed under Sub-head E an item of £45,000 for boats and vessels. He objected to the item because soldiers were not the proper persons to take charge of boats and vessels. Under Sub-head I. there was an item of £80,000 for a similar matter, "including vessels and for repairs." He desired some explanation of these items, as it appeared to him that inside the War Office a miniature Admiralty was growing up, and he objected to the principles.

CAPTAIN NORTON pressed for an answer as to what was being done with the thousands of Mauser rifles coming into the possession of our troops in South Africa, whether they were to be sold in South Africa, or whether they would be sold in this country for the benefit of rifle clubs.

MR. HARDY (Kent, Ashford) pointed out that although the Yeomanry were taken to different places in order to be trained, and to acquire greater skill in shooting, it was rather late in the day to allow them to shoot with obsolete weapons. He drew attention to the carbines now being issued, and asked whether the old form of carbine was being manufactured and issued, or whether it was intended to arm the Yeomanry with an improved and more modern weapon.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Baronet the Member for Great Yarmouth has really raised a very large question. As to reserves of armaments and equipment, of course there are reserves in this country, but they are not, in the opinion of the Director General of Ordnance, at all adequate to meet our needs, nor do I think that a fixed standard of reserve has been arrived at or maintained in respect of many articles. It is a very important question, and one upon which the Director General was at work long before the war broke out, and a Committee has been engaged in collecting a great deal of evidence on which the Government will act. As, however, I shall have to explain the programme adopted to the House, I would ask the hon. Member not to anticipate the explanation now. But the principle of a fixed reserve has been accepted. The War Office is not going to enter into competition with the Admiralty in the matter of vessels and boats, but there are cases in which money is saved by the Army having its own boats, as, for example, to tow targets, to carry coals and stores from one shore to another. We recognise the necessity of arming all the troops with the most recent weapon, and as soon as a better carbine is obtained it will be supplied to the Yeomanry.

*SIR J. COLOMB asked whether, when the hon. Gentleman came to the House with his proposals, he would be in a position to say who was responsible for the present condition of things.

MR. WYNDHAM: No one is responsible. The Government is responsible.

CAPTAIN NORTON: And what about the Mauser rifles?

MR. WYNDHAM: I will consider that suggestion, but the time is not ripe.

Vote agreed to.

5. £2,670,700, Works, Buildings, and Repairs. Cost, including Staff for Engineer Services.

DR. FARQUHARSON desired to know what was being done as to the erection of the new barracks in Millbank. The right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury no doubt knew this subject by heart, as he had been bombarded by questions upon it. He (Dr. Farquharson) was very anxious upon the question, having regard to the fact that the St. George's Barracks abut on the National Gallery. He wished to know when the War Office was going to do its share towards the preservation of the very valuable pictures of the nation from the risk of being destroyed; and when people might lie down at night without the reflection that a fire might dissipate the whole of these valuable pictures acquired at great expense. The strong argument against removing the barracks appeared to be that this was a great recruiting ground; but if the right hon. Gentleman had been down to the barracks and seen the way in which the recruiting was done he would admit that nothing was so likely to chill the early military ardour of the recruit as taking him to this barracks, which was a deadly, dreary, depressing, dirty hole. The first thing to be done was to clear the barracks away, and put them where they ought to be, at Millbank. There was only eighteen inches of brickwork between the Turner Room in the National Gallery and the canteen room of the barracks, which might be filled with inflammable materials, and what possible precaution could be taken to protect the National Gallery from fire or smoke, volumes of which would be projected in at the windows if the wind was blowing in a favourable direction? The hon. Member also asked what was being done to make the Piershill barracks more sanitary. It was unfair that young people should be compelled to live in such a very insanitary place. He also pressed for information as to the working of the sewage farm at Aldershot.

CAPTAIN NORTON said that perhaps the Financial Secretary would be able to say what steps, if any, had been taken with regard to the improvement of sanitary arrangements at the factory at Pimlico. Very grave complaints, he was informed,

'had been made with regard to the sanitary arrangements there.

MR. WARNER noticed that in the Vote there was no sum put down for huts or anything of that description. A very large number had been ordered, and he thought their cost ought to appear in this Vote. Wooden huts were essentially temporary matters, and that item should appear.

CAPTAIN JESSEL (St. Pancras, S.) asked what progress had been made in the provision of cubicles in barracks. He drew attention to the fact that considerable interest was displayed in this subject in the previous year, and it would be interesting to know what steps had been taken. Another subject to which he drew attention was the lighting of the barrack rooms, which in a great many cases, especially in the sleeping rooms, were lighted with only one gas burner, and that very often a very bad one. Anything more depressing could not be conceived. He wished to know whether there was any intention to instal the electric light in barracks.

*SIR J. COLOMB asked why no provision was made in this Estimate for the accommodation of the garrison at Wei-hai-wei. He also called attention to the fact that for the first time a sum of £25,400 appeared in these Estimates in respect of the garrison at Esquimalt. Under the old system the cost of the garrison at Esquimalt was defrayed by the Government of Canada.

MR. ALLAN asked why in this Vote there was nothing allowed for the defence of the river Tyne. There were no fortifications there for the defence of the river, which was second in importance to none in the Empire. It had on its banks what was practically the principal arsenal in the Empire, even excelling that of Woolwich. He should be glad to know why there was nothing on the Estimates for the defence of the river.

MR. WYNDHAM: The defence of the Tyne and the accommodation of the garrison at Wei-hai-wei were provided for in the loan of last year. The Government are taking £500,000 for huts in South Africa, and £500,000 for huts at home. It is quite certain that a certain number of troops will remain in South Africa, and very probably a certain number will come back before there is barrack accommodation for them in this country. Therefore, we are making provision for the supply of huts. There is also a sum of about £47,000 for putting up storehouses in which the reserve stores will be placed. With that exception there is nothing in this Vote which raises any new question of policy. With regard to the Esquimalt garrison, an arrangement has been come to between the Colonial Office and the Government of Canada in accordance with which Canada will eventually contribute £12,500 of this money. If the hon. Member for West Newington can point out any grave defect in the sanitary arrangements at the Pimlico dépôt the matter will be attended to. As to the question of cubicles, it will be recollected that the Government undertook to build barracks so that the cubicle system could be introduced. That has been done, and experiments have been made, but the last six months has not been suitable for these experiments.

CAPTAIN NORTON asked where the enormous number of huts to be provided in this country were to be put up.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): The exact localities have not been definitely settled. The question as to the National Gallery should have been addressed to my right hon. friend at the head of the Office of Works. There is no actual contact between the National Gallery and the St. George's Barracks. But as soon as the barracks at Millbank are completed there will be a removal from Trafalgar Square to them. The work at Millbank is being pushed forward as rapidly as possible, but I cannot say when it will be finished. As regards the barracks at Piershill the hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension. The barracks at Piershill may not be the most comfortable, but they certainly are not such as to be wholly condemned. The sanitary condition of the sewage farm at Aldershot is first rate, and it is undoubtedly an advantage to the camp to receive supplies from it.

MR. ALLAN: May I call the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that it is well known that Piershill barracks are insanitary, notwithstanding what he may say to the contrary. I dare say it is simply because they happen to be Scotch barracks that you are not interested in them. It is well known that they are the most insanitary barracks in the whole of Scotland.

DR. FARQUHARSON stated that residence in Piershill barracks was harmful to the health of the men. He also remarked that there was no use trying to get away from the fact that the canteen room of St. George's Barracks was separated by only eighteen inches from the National Gallery. He could state on the authority of the President of the Royal Academy that the National Gallery was subjected to great danger in that way.

COLONEL WELBY stated that on account of the insanitary condition of Piershill Barracks it would be far better instead of spending money on them to remove them right away to another place.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS promised to take the opinion of the Director-General of the Army Medical Department as to the actual sanitary condition of the buildings and site of Piershill barracks.

Vote agreed to.

6. £113,800, Establishments for Military Education.

7. £66,900, Miscellaneous Effective Services.

8. £1,611,000, Retired Pay, Half-Pay, and other Non-Effective Charges for Officers, &c.

MR. BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) drew the attention of the Committee to the manner in which Line officers serving in the Militia had been treated with reference to retired pay. It had been the custom of the War Office to try and attract Line officers into the Militia by giving them extra pensions or additional retired pay if they served a certain number of years in the Militia. On embodiment, however, the retired pay was taken away altogether, so that during the whole of the embodiment the officers merely received the ordinary pay of a Line captain. There were other instances in which the treatment of the officers was absurd. It would be said that the officers knew perfectly well that they would not receive retired pay if the Militia was embodied, but from the point of view of broad policy he denied that it was wise to deprive the officers at a time of national emergency of money which really represented pension for past services. He hoped that this matter would be very fully considered, and that the War Office would treat these officers not merely with bare justice but with liberality.

MR. ALLAN: This Vote is entitled "For half-pay and other charges for officers," and the total of this Vote represents £1,611,000. If I am not at all diverging from the point, I should like to ask the reason why that sum of money is voted for officers, while there is a less sum of money voted for the non-commissioned officers and men.

*MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: With regard to the question just raised, the answer is a very simple one. The conditions of service which the officers accept, and which the men accept are provided for in this Vote. The officer accepts a commission on the condition that he is entitled to a certain pension. The soldier, on the other hand, accepts service in the Army on a different condition. The one condition results in the charge provided for in this Vote, and the other in the charge to which the hon. Member has also referred, and which is on another Vote. Turning to the question raised by my hon. friend the Member for Tonbridge, I think he has put his finger upon an anomaly. He points out that the officer who has retired with a pension has the whole of his pension stopped whilst the Militia with which he is serving is embodied; while on the other hand, another officer who has retired on a gratuity has the advantage of the interest on that gratuity without any stoppage as was formerly the case. I think that is an anomaly, and I will call the attention of my noble friend the Secretary of State to the matter with a view to taking his opinion as to whether something cannot be done in regard to it. With regard to the general question, however, I do not think my hon. friend has made out a grievance. A retired officer joins the Militia on the condition that he should receive a certain pension; embodiment takes place, and during the period of embodiment that officer is certainly pecuniarily better off than he would be if he were receiving only his pension. The difficulty in the way of his receiving his pension at the same time that he receives full pay is that he may be serving alongside a brother officer who would not be receiving anything like as much for his services as the retired officer serving with the Militia would get, if he got not only his full pay but his pension also. I think that is the answer to my hon. friend, and he can hardly expect under such circumstances that any change will be made.

MR. BOSCAWEN: May I point out that the man who takes a gratuity receives the interest on that gratuity in addition to his pay. The other man asks simply that he should get the equivalent to that interest, otherwise he is not really getting full pay, as a part of the pay comes from the Government and the other part really out of his own pocket, because during embodiment he is losing the whole of his pension.

Vote, agreed to.

9. £1,379,000, Pensions and other Non-Effective Charges for Warrant Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers, Men, and others.

10. £186,000, Superannuation, Compensation, Compassionate Allowances and Gratuities.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £63,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Ordnance Factories (the cost of the Productions of which will be charged to the Army, Navy, and Indian and Colonial Governments), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901."

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): This Vote is not down for to-day—

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The hon. Gentleman, I think, was about to rise to a point of order?

MR. CALDWELL: Yes.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am given to understand—though it is not for me to Mr. J. Powell-Williams.

say—that the Ordnance Factory Vote is included in the Army Estimates. I suppose, therefore, in the strictly technical sense it is down for to-day. But I believe in ordinary practice it is taken separately, and if objection is seriously taken to it the Government will not press it. At the same time, it would be a convenience if we could get it to-night.

MR. CALDWELL: It is one of those Votes upon which there is always a considerable amount of discussion, and it is always put down separately. That is the reason I objected; not that I wished to hinder progress at all.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BEER RETAILERS' AND SPIRIT GROCCERS' LICENCES (IRELAND) (No. 2) BILL.

As amended, considered.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): Upon Clause 1 I should like to make one remark. We have not been able to ascertain for ourselves what it means. I understand that a material amendment was made in this Bill during the period of its somewhat private passage through the Committee. I do not see the hon. Gentleman who is in charge of the Bill in his place, but I believe I am right in saying that words were introduced which rendered this Bill inapplicable to any existing licences, and only applicable to new ones. I think that is one inconvenience of a system which has been allowed to continue notwithstanding many protests which have been made against it.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) : Upon a point of order. Is the right hon. Gentleman moving an Amendment?

*MR. SPEAKER: I understand from the observations of the right hon. Gentleman that he is about to move an Amendment.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I am going to move the elimination of Clause 1. This is one of the instances where material alterations are made in a Bill during its passage through Committee without any intimation to this House, and when we come to deal with the Bill on the Report stage we find it is upon entirely new lines. Although it is ostensibly the same as that which we were called upon to consider in the previous stages, it has been by these alterations considerably limited and restricted. How does the House stand with regard to precedents which have been established in this matter? This Bill has been presented to us under false pretences. We are asked in this Bill to lay down precedents and alter the law in a way which we should have to keep in view when dealing with kindred subjects. My hon. friend and those associated with him propose to alter the law upon lines which have not hitherto commended themselves to the legislators of this country. The subject is one which has engaged a great deal of attention, and it is most important for the House to carefully consider how far it should deal with the various branches of a great subject in a piecemeal fashion. The system of off-licences is a system of which I entirely disapprove; it was a system introduced by the late Mr. Gladstone, and if the hon. Gentleman who supports the Bill would insert a clause repealing the whole of that legislation by the right hon. Gentleman he would have my cordial support. This Bill, in a very limited manner, proposes to deal with only one branch of the subject, and I am told that this very serious modification of the Bill, which we now see for the first time, was the result of an arrangement. Now, I am always very suspicious of arrangements. By exempting all licences already granted, a very serious departure is made, and the clause as it now stands commits this House to a widely different proposal to that which was originally put before us. I would not take exception to the policy of putting all licences on relatively identical terms, but I do not think the grocers should have advantages which an ordinary publican is denied. I think all those who sell intoxicating drink should be placed on the same footing.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): In the year 1882 my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade carried through this House a Bill which placed all licences in England in the hands of the licensing justices. The ordinary retail beer licences were also brought under the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and that Act was always supposed to relate to Ireland as well as England; but by a decision of the Judges in the Irish Court of Queen's Bench it was held that that Act did not apply to Ireland, and the Bill now before the House has been introduced in order to assimilate the law of Ireland with that of England.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: The hon. Gentleman referred to the Act of 1882. He did not refer to that of 1880, but he confirms me in my impression that nothing in the Act of 1880 or the amending Act of 1882 affected the sale of spirits, and therefore this Act dealing with the retailer of beer for the first time has in it the imported element of spirits. I do not object to that, but I must enter my protest against a subject of this kind being introduced by an irresponsible, or perhaps I ought to say an unofficial, private Member of this House. A subject of this kind, dealing as it does with a large trade, and, what is of more importance, a trade carried on for the public convenience, should not be dealt with in a piecemeal fashion without strict regard to precedent, but should be introduced by an official Member of the House. I beg to move that Clause 1 be omitted from the Bill.

Amendment proposed—

(Mr. James Lowther.)

MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham): I am extremely glad my right hon.

friend has moved to omit Clause 1. It is practically the whole Bill, and his moving its rejection will give us some opportunity of obtaining that explanation which hitherto we have not had given to us in this House as to how this arrangement was come to. An arrangement was come to by which the Second Reading was allowed to be taken, and the Bill then went to the Grand Committee on Trade.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: No; it was a Committee of the whole House.

AN HON. MEMBER: It was smuggled through.

*MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I object to the words "smuggled through."

MR. BANBURY: I was not aware that it was a Committee of the whole House; but there is this to be said against Bills of this kind being brought in after twelve o'clock, that unless hon. Members remain in their seats after twelve o'clock they never hear anything about them.

*MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON: I hope the House will not agree to place any obstacle in the way of the passing of this measure. This Bill became necessary because of the Act of 1882 not affecting Ireland, and only applies to new licences. An agreement was arrived at with regard to it by both sides of the House, and I trust my right hon. friend will not insist upon preventing us, on one of those rare occasions when Ireland is unanimous, passing this Bill.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I look upon this Bill with a considerable amount of suspicion, because of that very agreement to which the hon. Gentleman has alluded. I innocently took the memorandum as a definition of what the Bill was to do, and I gathered that it was a Bill to assimilate the law of Ireland with that of England, but I now find that is not the fact. It will not create similarity at all, but will create another point of difference in the licensing laws. Another very curious fact is that every Member who holds a copy of this Bill in his hands holds an erroneous copy. There are two Bills, No. 1

Bill and No. 2 Bill, and while one Bill was amended in Committee the Amendments appeared in the copy of the other Bill, so that anybody going to the Vote Office for a copy of the Bill will find nothing in the Bill about new licences. Now the question of old and new licences is one of very considerable importance, and I should like to hear from somebody responsible for this Bill what the position of all beer and spirit licences in Ireland since the decision of the Irish Courts of which mention has been made. There appears to have been a decision by the Irish Courts which held that the Act of 1882 did not apply to Ireland, and that would put all licences in Ireland on a different footing to the licences here. I should like somebody to explain what the position really is. I have no interest whatever in this trade, and have always declined to take any shares in this traffic, but I invite the attention of the House to the words of Clause 1. If hon. Members will look at the clause they will find—

"1. Notwithstanding anything in any Act now in force the licensing justices shall be at liberty, in their free and unqualified discretion, either to refuse a certificate for any licence for sale of beer or spirits by retail, to be consumed off the premises, on any grounds appearing to them sufficient, or to grant the same to such persons as they, in the execution of their statutory powers, and in the exercise of their discretion deem fit and proper, and in order thereto shall be at liberty to hear and receive and act upon any objection and any evidence either in support thereof or in aid of the application made or tendered by any resident or owner of property in the parish wherein are situate the house and premises in respect of which such certificate is applied for."

Under this Bill the licensing justices are to decide without evidence at all; but they may receive evidence and act upon it, but it is not to be upon oath. I do not know whether that is the law in England, but if it is, it is a very hard law, and I object to it.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Speaking simply as an Irish Member, and not as a member of the Government, I may say the explanation of the unanimity in Ireland between the trade and the temperance party is this: Owing to a recent decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, the country is liable to be flooded with off-licences, which the magistrates would be bound to grant whether they thought they were necessary or not, and the object of the Bill is to give the same right of objection in the case of off-licences as is given in the case of on-licences. This Bill is supported by all the licence-holders, and I think we might be better employed than in prolonging discussion upon this small matter.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said that if the clause was to stand, it would be desirable that some modifications should be made in this clause. It appeared to him, from the wording of the clause, that the magistrates might act upon any objection without evidence, but it ought to be enacted that they should not be able to do so unless the objection was supported by evidence. He proposed to move an Amendment in order to test that point.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Amendment before the House is the omission of Clause 1.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I do not wish to stand in the way of my hon. friend if he has an Amendment to propose.

*MR. SPEAKER: I have already put the question, that Clause 1 stand part of the Bill.

MR. TOMLINSON: Then if no Amendment can now be moved, it is to be hoped that if this clause is passed it will be amended in another place.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I am unwilling to put the House to the trouble of a division, and therefore beg to withdraw my Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

An Amendment made.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

MR. BANBURY: I think there has been some misunderstanding upon this, and I strongly object to the Third Reading being taken.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: This opens up a question going very far beyond the merits or demerits of the Bill. It is now proposed to accumulate two stages of a measure in this House, and that is a matter upon which Members are entitled to express their opinion and signify so far as they can, according to the light of their judgment, if they have the opportunity of deciding. Either the Bill is to be rejected or it is passed in accumulated stages. I object to the accumulation of the stages of a Bill. We used to have the opportunity on the introduction of a Bill of an explanation of its provisions, and of discussing it even at the Report stage. The Second Reading existed as it does now. We further had an opportunity of a motion put to the Chair.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman would hardly be in order in discussing the rules of the House.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I bow to your ruling, Sir, and I will not do more than urge upon the House that it should view with grave suspicion the desire to accumulate the stages of this Bill. I do not object to the Bill on its merits, but I do object to its passing this stage without some explanation, and I think a most dangerous precedent would be established if it is allowed to pass to-day.

*MR. SPEAKER: When the hon. Gentleman speaks about creating a precedent he is mistaken as to a precedent being now created. The same thing has been done over and over again during my time and the time of my predecessor. Two or three years ago the right hon. Gentleman called my attention to this point on a similar occasion, and I then pointed out to him that, in the time of Mr. Speaker Peel, Bills were on several occasions read a third time after a division taken, although a contentious discussion had taken place the same day upon Amendments moved and divided upon. I would point out in this case that the only Amendment that has been made is purely a drafting one.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: Then I beg to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. James Lowther.)

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) desired to call attention to the fact that the hon. Members who were so greatly concerned with the passing of the Bill were entirely absent, and that if the Bill were to be read a third time it ought to have the support of those whom it most concerned—the Irish Members. He thought, in the interests of Ireland itself, it would be unwise to prematurely pass the Bill through the House.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): This Bill was brought on at a time when, I regret, I was unavoidably absent from the House, but, so far as I know, this is an absolutely unopposed Bill. Up to within a few months ago the law of Ireland with regard to this matter was assumed to be the same as the law of England, but owing to the decision of the Irish Courts it was held not to be so, and therefore it became necessary to assimilate the law of Ireland to that of England, and so this Bill has already got to a very advanced stage. I trust the House will now read it a third time.

Question put.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT (1897) EXTENSION BILL.

Order for consideration, as amended (by the Standing Committee), read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

*MR. STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.), who had given notice to move "That this House regrets that so many agricultural labourers will be excluded from receiving any compensation for death or injury under the Bill," said the Bill had been considerably altered, and its scope restricted, since the Government had taken it out of the hands of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Lowestoft, who originally had the conduct of it. The Bill originally provided for the agricultural labourers coming within the Act of 1897. By the alteration which had taken place in Committee, through the introduction of the word "habitually" a very large number of labourers would be precluded from the benefits of the Bill. He regretted that the Government should think it necessary to put such a limitation on the Bill, because it would make invidious distinctions and set up two classes of men, one of whom would have privileges under this Bill whilst the other would not, for it was right that agricultural labourers should come within the provisions of the Act, and if that proposition was granted the only way to deal with the matter was to give compensation to all men working on big or small farms, whether by the year or only for the summer quarter. It was said that the burden of paying compensation to all would be too great. If that were so, why did not the Government accept the proposal made by him in the Standing Committee? His proposal was that the owner and not the occupier should be responsible for compensation, and he had been able to show that the cost of insuring against such liability was very small indeed, and would be no appreciable burden upon landlords. He did not propose to move the Amendment standing in his name, but he desired that some explanation might be given by the Government as to why it was necessary to mutilate the Bill originally introduced.

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S. W.):
 The hon. Gentleman began his remarks by complaining that the Bill had not been taken charge of by the Government.
 I am not aware that the Government have adopted a different position with regard to this Bill from what they always adopt in Grand Committee. I always find that the Minister responsible for a Department to which a Bill refers is present. It was essential that the Government should advise the Committee of the effect of the proposals contained in the Bill. In this particular instance the Government have adopted the same position as in former cases. We received valuable assistance from the Government in the Grand Committee. The hon.
 Member said there were a large number of agricultural labourers whom the Bill would exclude from the benefits to be conferred. That was an indefinite statement.
 He gave us no proximate idea of the large number to be excluded, and entirely based his argument on a word which occurs in Clause 1. When the original Act was introduced the Home Secretary told us that he estimated that there were roughly 13,000,000 persons employed in the various trades and employments throughout the country, and he estimated that of that number 6,000,000 would come under the Bill and 7,000,000 would be excluded. In the estimate of 7,000,000 he estimated the number of agricultural labourers at 1,700,000. I have no doubt these figures are proximately correct. I want to know how many of these 1,700,000 are employed by farmers who habitually do not employ workmen during the course of the year. It is necessary that the farmer should employ one or more workmen throughout the course of the year to come within the scope of the Bill. I do not believe that the number to be excluded are any large amount at all. I certainly think that before the hon. Gentleman suggests that my hon. friend who has charge of the Bill is excluding a large number of agricultural labourers he should give us some data to go on. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to make out what a horrible Government this is, and how they have "left" the agricultural labourer, he should go down and explain his case to the constituencies. I would then be able to understand his remarks, but for any other purpose I fail entirely to understand the reason for his observations. I hope the House will agree to this Bill now being considered, and I sincerely trust that we shall make it as good a Bill as it can be made. I do not think it is by any means a perfect Bill.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): It is hardly fair that the Government should be attacked for the limitation which has been inserted in this Bill, because the limitation did not proceed from the Government. I think the first limitation was one of my own in regard to properties of one acre. Immediately after that a great number of further amendments were placed on the Paper. The Standing Committee were almost unanimous that some limitation was absolutely necessary. The only question was whether it should be the slight limitation suggested by myself, or the large limitation suggested by some hon. Members. I do not think we can attack the Government in regard to that matter. At the same time my hon. friend is, I think, thoroughly justified in raising the discussion on this Bill, for it is one of extreme difficulty from the legal point of view, and all who were present at the Standing Committee will be aware of the fact that the House cannot too carefully scrutinise the Bill. We need not discuss whether there has been an undue amount of litigation in the matter. There has been a great deal of litigation, and we ought to take every possible means in our power this afternoon to prevent a recurrence of litigation similar to that which has taken place under the principal Act. This Bill appears to be more than a mere extension of the other Act. The Bill contains two other different uses of the word "workman," both of which are different from the definition in the original Act. If we are not very careful in the wording of the Act there will be a terrible amount of litigation arising out of it. I cannot but regret that this Bill should stand on the paper immediately before the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors to Children Bill. I am personally in favour of that Bill, but those who take part in the discussion of the Compensation Bill seem to be open to the charge that they desire to prevent the discussion of the next Order on the Paper. I can assure the House that is not the case with many Members, who, while deeply regretting the possibility of standing in the way of that measure, are bound, out of regard for the interests of their constituents, to discuss the measure before the House. The Government have assured the promoters of this Bill that they will find time for it; and they seem to attach more importance to it than to their own measures. It would, therefore, be better if they took the Bill into their own hands, so that there should be no failure at this or any other stage. There is another matter that makes it difficult to discuss the Bill to-day. It is the absolute absence of the Irish Members from the House. The Bill affects Ireland in a larger degree than this country. All the difficulties that arise on this Bill are difficulties which will be much greater in the case of Ireland, and yet we are discussing the Bill in the absence of the Nationalist Members. It is a most unfortunate fact that there were no Irish Members on the Standing Committee, and here we are going to discuss a Bill which will have a most extraordinarily close bearing on the affairs of every parish in Ireland in the absence of those who are supposed to be most nearly in touch with the small Irish farmers. The question of limitation we can only deal with on the report stage. The answer to the suggestion that the liability should be thrown on the landlord and not on the occupier is that in many cases the owner and occupier were the same person. In my own constituency there are 3,500 workmen freeholders who would all have been within the Bill as originally drawn. When we discussed the mother Act some of us pointed out how difficult it would be to apply the measure, because unless you have some sort of Government guarantee, State insurance, or State control, you give a merely illusory security. It is impossible to throw the responsibility in certain cases on the owner instead of the occupier, because the owner and occupier are the same man. That is a case for some limitation or exclusion unless you have Government insurance or responsibility which we cannot contemplate in this Bill.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): I do not know whether it is really necessary to speak at this stage on behalf of the Government, because the case for the Government has been put by my hon. friend the Member for South-west Manchester, and by the right hon. Baronet, who has dealt with the subject in another way. It is not quite accurate to say that the position of the Government in respect of this Bill is one of actual responsibility. In the Grand Committee the Government have shown that they are prepared to support it and to make it effective. Where difficulties have existed the Government have suggested alterations in order to remove them, and the suggestions made in the Grand Committee are in the main accepted, while the Government also undertook to assist hon. Members responsible for the measure in securing such further amendments as would make it clear and workable. I think I may say on behalf of the Government that there is only one desire in regard to the Bill—namely, to make it as comprehensive as it justly and fairly can be made, as well as clear and effective. I am not so afraid as the right hon. Baronet that litigation will be likely to arise from the passing of the Bill. The experience gained from the working of the parent Act has undoubtedly thrown a flood of light on the question of employers' liability, and that question is now in a more satisfactory position than it was previous to the passing of the last amending Act. I do not think that there will be any material difference as to agricultural employment. The assurance societies are prepared to offer reasonable terms to employers for insuring their men, and the liability, therefore, of the employers will be removed from them. The difficulty, no doubt a serious one, will be to bring home to the smaller employers the liabilities which they incur after the passing of the Bill. That is a difficulty which the Board of Agriculture will endeavour to meet by circulating the fullest information as to the effect of the measure. It has been said that the Bill will exclude a vast number of labourers from its operation. I do not believe that anything of the kind will occur. I do not think it will be possible to make the Bill apply to all agricultural employment. Everyone who knows how the smaller kinds of agriculture are conducted is aware that labourers employed in a better class of local employment make it a practice for their own advantage to employ casual labour and to devote themselves to the wage-earning labour. To throw upon one labourer a liability of this kind in respect of casual employment on allotments would, I think, be a great injustice. I agree with what has been said as to the difficulties of the question and the importance of the Bill. I have made it my business, along with the Home Secretary, to consult with those who have placed Amendments on the Paper to clear up doubts and difficulties. We have received the advice not only of the Attorney General, but of the legal advisers of the two Departments, and I have every reason to believe that if the House accepts some of the Amendments the Bill will be made as clear and as effective as it is possible for the Government to make it. I admit that there is a good deal to be said in favour of the criticism of the word "habitually"; but we have not been able to find a better word. It conveys the meaning better than any other word which has been suggested, and without it the Government could not assent to the passing of the Bill. If the application is not limited in this way the result will be to cast responsibility upon a large number of very small people who may have to compensate men no worse off than themselves. This would be a great injustice, because these men are only casual employers for a short period of the year. I hope that the House will see fit to proceed with the measure.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I am sure that the House will cordially accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the Government are prepared to do all they can to give effect to the Bill. I was a little disappointed, however, that the right hon. Gentleman has not given a more favourable reception to the appeal of my right hon. friend that the Government should themselves take charge of the Bill and find the necessary time for its passing. Everyone must feel that this is one of the most important Bills of the session, if not the most important. Its operation will be very wide, and no doubt it is a measure which will lead to a great deal of controversy. The right hon. Gentleman ought therefore to take the responsibility of ultimately passing the Bill, for, after all, it is the Board of Agriculture that ought to be held responsible by the agricultural labourers and the country for the framework of the Bill. They were responsible for the Compensation Bill. There is no doubt that the private Member in this case has performed an extremely valuable duty in bringing to the birth a measure which but for him would never have seen the light. Then the nurse of the Bill ought to be the Government, and they ought to see that the Bill is brought to maturity in a form which will give satisfaction. I know I have been a party to the ousting of private Members from a great deal of their time, but when there is a Bill of this kind which has reached this stage I do think that the right hon. Gentleman below the gangway is right in saying that the Government ought to undertake it. I venture to say that they have no Bill in reserve of anything like the importance of this. This Bill, as my right hon. friend has said, must take a considerable time in discussion. There will be discussion, for instance on the one word "habitually" in the Bill. You cannot expect that these controversies will not take some time. There will be a great deal of difference of opinion on this subject. I confess that I take a very considerable interest in the Bill that is immediately to follow this Bill. I understand that private Members are to be deprived during the rest of the session of Wednesdays, with two exceptions, and I think the time now at the disposal of private Members ought to be relieved of curtailment by the Government undertaking to watch over the further progress of this Bill. If the Government will only undertake the conduct of this Bill, as they have done more or less in the Grand Committee, then, I think, a difficulty will be removed.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. This subject is one eminently suitable for treatment by a private Member. It is a question on which both political parties are agreed, and the only thing to do is to so carefully word the Bill as to carry out what we all desire. Surely that is a matter that may be taken in hand by private Members. From my hon. friend's speech, I gather that his opposition to the Bill before the House is based on his opinion, not that so many agricultural labourers will be excluded from the operation of the Bill, but rather that so many agricultural labourers who are interested will not receive compensation. I am one of those who put down in Grand Committee this limitation which has been adopted by the Government. I put it down then and I support it now because of the difficulty which would arise in the payment of compensation by small and occasional employers. These small holders who occasionally employ a man to do an occasional job have no wage bill, and it is no good telling them they can insure against their liability. The premium may amount to only a few shillings on £100 of wages, but where the wage bill does not amount to £100 in ten years any premium would be a very substantial increase to the sum the man has to pay. It is an unfortunate necessity that any agricultural labourer should have to stand outside the benefits of this Act. We might consider whether the number who would be so excluded would be large or small. Such a point does not affect the principle of the matter, but it does affect the practical consideration of the question. In the first place, I doubt very much whether there are a large number of labourers in this country who always work in casual agricultural employment. The hon. Member for South Somerset rather suggests that the men who only casually employ a labourer form the larger part of the farmers. It is almost impossible to call such men farmers at all. The man we propose to protect is a man who is practically a labourer himself. There are hundreds such in every country district; they work one day for themselves on their own allotments or gardens, and the next day perhaps work for their neighbour on his allotment or garden. It would be absurd to say if A was working on the plot of B on Monday and was injured, B should compensate him, whereas if B the next day was working on A's plot and was injured, the compensation should be the other way. It seems almost impossible to adopt such a suggestion as that. But will the accidents in regard to the casual employment of such very small men as that be numerous? I am glad to think that the number of accidents in rural districts is very small compared with the number of accidents in almost any other employment. Agriculture may not be remunerative, but it is more or less safe. If there are accidents they occur mainly from three sources, namely, the use of machinery, the use of spirited horses, or from the liability of men to fall from high stacks or ricks. In the case of these very small men machinery is not employed, so that that source of danger may be excluded from the point we are considering. Nor are their horses spirited. They usually have but one horse, and it is generally of a chastened spirit. I do not suggest that the owner does not take proper care of it, but it has much work to do, and such horses do not bring about accidents by their high spirits. Then the stacks of these men are not high. I wish these men had more to put into their stacks, but as a matter of fact the stacks are not very high, so that that source of danger to the agricultural labourer does not apply. The hon. Member for South Somerset said there was no fund from which compensation could properly be drawn, and he suggested that the landowners should pay. I believe there are some owners who do, as a matter of fact, insure the workmen of their tenants. But I see a very practical difficulty in the case of these casual labourers on very small holdings. Insurance companies base their rates of premium on the wages bill. One fills in a schedule of the amount of wages it is anticipated will be paid in the year, and at the end of the year that is adjusted with the company. If you have paid more wages you pay a little more premium; if you have paid less wages the company makes you an allowance. But how could that be done in the case of a landowner insuring the casual labourers of his very small tenants? He would have to go round and ask every single cottager on his estate how many times he had had A or B to do a job for him and paid him a shilling or two for his services, and the making up of a wages bill would be a matter of considerable practical difficulty. Moreover, if I was a director of an insurance company, which I am not, I should say, "We insure you employers against accidents to workmen, but we rely on your exercising some discretion as to the men you employ." Now, if a landowner indirectly insures the labourer of his very small tenant, he has no control over that labourer. He might be a man whose intemperance was such that it was extremely probable to bring about an accident, and I very much doubt whether insurance companies would undertake to insure owners against accidents to men over whom they had no control whatever. But these poor men, whose case we are considering, will not go absolutely without any help. The great friendly societies of the country provide accident funds, and a man, if he belonged to one of these societies, would be able to go on the funds of his society. It is one of the glories of this Parliament that we have provided so much compensation for so many workmen who are injured in the course of their employment, and that we have done it by encouraging the system of insurance, without injuring the employers. We should, however, be doing harm and not good to the labouring population if we taught them to throw all their cares on the Government and to make no provision for accidents happening to themselves. If any labourer said, "I am so fully insured under the Workmen's Compensation Act that I need not continue my subscription to my club," he would be acting foolishly, because an accident may happen to him when he is working on his own plot or allotment, or when he is not working for anybody at all, and then if he has taken his name off his club he will receive no compensation whatever. The hon. Member for South Somerset says that we should look closely at the words of this Bill. That is very true, especially as regards the third version of the words which has been laid before us for carrying out the object we all desire. I have compared the Bill as brought into this House with the Bill as it left the Grand Committee, and I think there are only about five words in the first operative clause which are in the same position now as when the Bill was read a second time. We have, therefore, an entirely different wording from that which we originally had to consider. I go a step further. If anybody will look at the Amendments on the Paper they will see that the Amendments proposed by the promoters of the Bill will again so change the substance, at any rate, of the wording as to make this a third Bill brought in during the present session. That being so, it is practically before us to consider which of the three wordings carry out our intentions in the best and wisest form. That is surely a matter, considering the greatness of the subject, which might absorb the attention and energy of this House upon this Wednesday afternoon. I am very glad that, whether on account of this or some other Bill, there is so large an attendance on this occasion, because in the multitude of counsellors that I see present perhaps we shall have an accumulation of wisdom. It is an opportunity for getting this Bill into the very best phraseology—a phraseology which even lawyers will understand, so that they will not have to fight over the meaning of it in the Courts; and to get such a phraseology as that will be a very worthy use of a Wednesday afternoon.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester): With regard to the small employer, my opinion and experience differ entirely from the view put forward by the hon. Member for Thirsk. The small employer is the man who has the worst machinery, the worst plant, and the most inefficient appliances; and also with regard to the one horse kept by these small employers my experience is different from that of the hon. Member. These men have not means adequate for the proper conduct of their business, and they have to buy horses that nobody else will buy; they have not the money to buy a good horse, so they get a "jibber," and a "jibber" is the most dangerous of all. I would much rather deal with the most spirited horse than with a "jibber." The most terrifying few minutes of my life during recent years were the result of the action of the only horse of one of these small farmers. My life, whatever it was worth, was in great danger, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I earnestly wished there were no such horses in the hands of small holders. A man is much safer in the employ of a large farmer than of a small employer. That of a large corporation is always the safest service in which to be engaged. The man serving under a farmer who only occasionally employs labour is under far more dangerous conditions than the man serving under a farmer who habitually employs labour; therefore the only logical course is to omit altogether the word "habitual." But I understand that to attempt to force that is to wreck the Bill. That is the position taken up by the Government, and I am not prepared to do anything calculated to have that effect. If there are any means of improving the measure without endangering its passage I will support them. On this Report stage I shall take precisely the same action as I took in the Grand Committee—namely, that of adopting such policy as I think is best calculated to ensure the passing of the Bill. The sensible appeal made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean does not appear to find favour with the only representative of the Cabinet present; therefore I take it that we must go on with the Bill, for the position is that we must have the Bill to-day or not at all. I am for having the Bill with all its defects. In this Bill, as in most Bills, there are many defects; this Bill to a large degree is full of defects. I entirely adopt the view of the hon. Member for South Somerset, that a very large number of labourers will be excluded from its scope. It is all very well to ask for statistics; it is easier to ask than to supply; but we all know that with regard to the Act of 1897 probably the larger proportion of the workers are outside of it. With regard to this present Bill probably the larger part of the agricultural labourers will come within its scope, but there will yet be a large number excluded. If the Government would agree to the omission of the word "habitual" I think they would make this a better, stronger, and more logical Bill. On the other hand, I recognise the danger of imposing upon a man who is himself only a labourer in degree the fearful responsibility which might be imposed upon him by the omission of the word "habitual"; and that brings me to this one point. In 1897 I expressed the opinion that there would be no final settlement of this question of compensation until a part or the whole of the compensation due to the workers was paid by the State. That is the only resting place, and to that point it will, in my judgment, ultimately come. There is no sound argument against it, and it will be impossible to give the workers full compensation until some measure of that kind is passed into law. I exceedingly regret the exclusion which will occur under these words. An accident is an accident and a loss is a loss, whether it is met with in the service of a poor or of a rich employer. This measure does not do all that we want, but we shall have to take what we can get, and I sincerely trust that such a policy may prevail this afternoon as will see the Bill through in an hour or so, so that we may get on to another interesting subject.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): When the Bill was before the Standing Committee the hon. Member for South Somersetshire and the hon. Member for the Lichfield Division were the only members of the committee who supported the proposal for solving the problem of bringing the whole body of agricultural labourers within its scope, by throwing the liability upon the owner of the land instead of upon the employer; and amongst others, the hon. Members for Leicester, Morpeth, and Battersea voted against this Amendment. They knew perfectly well that such a proposal was inconsistent with the principle of the original Act, which was that the burden should fall upon the employers actually interested, so as to make them feel pecuniarily the responsibility of looking after the safety of those whom they employed. In the discussions on the Act of 1897 representatives of the working men insisted over and over again that their object was not to obtain money compensation, but to secure greater safety of employment. The proposal under discussion would make this Bill not an extension of the Act of 1897, but a reversal of the principle of that measure.

MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham): With regard to the suggestion that exceptional measures should be adopted for the passage of this Bill, there will be plenty of time, if it is found that Wednesday is not sufficient, for the right hon. Baronet then to urge the Government to take other steps. There is no reason to depart now from the usual course and to take a private Member's Bill out of its regular place on the Paper in the midst of the discussion, especially when we have at least three hours for its consideration. I am glad that we have this opportunity of discussing what is undoubtedly an extremely important measure. I am rather inclined to agree that a certain number of workmen will be excluded from the operation of this Bill. I am sorry the hon. Member opposite did not give any statistics or grounds for that supposition; I was most anxious to hear on what he founded that belief. But undoubtedly the inclusion of the word "habitual" must to a certain extent deprive a number of men of the benefits of this measure. In 1897, when the Workmen's Compensation Bill was before the House, I voted against the inclusion of agricultural labourers within the scope of that measure, because I thought that agriculture was in such an extremely bad condition that it would not be able to stand the heavy charges which such an inclusion would involve. Since then we have seen that the cost of insurance is considerably less than was anticipated, and that on the whole the Act of 1897 has worked well. It seems to me, therefore, that we have good ground for bringing the agricultural labourers within the operation of the Act. But if you bring in agricultural labourers at all I cannot conceive why every agricultural labourer should not be brought in. The agricultural labourer employed by a small man may be injured just as seriously as the man employed by the big farmer, but if the word "habitual" is left in he will not get the benefits of the Act. The object is to include all men who are injured in the course of their avocation, and therefore I hope that, if, as I understand, the Amendment to leave out the word "habitual" cannot be accepted, some means may be found by which these men will not be deprived of the benefits we wish to see extended to them. I cannot agree with the suggestion that the charge should be put upon the landowners. The effect of such a course would be to discourage care on the part of farmers in seeing that their appliances were in good order and in doing everything they could to enable their labourers to carry out their work without injury, as there would be no incentive to the farmer to take ordinary precautions. Nor can I agree with the hon. Member for Thirsk that in every instance the poor employer has the best appliances. I rather agree with the hon. Member for Leicester on that point, though I do not believe that the "jibbing" horse is such a dangerous animal as he would have us suppose. I have had several such horses myself, and it is my belief that the "jibbing" can be cured if the horse is treated properly. The absence of the Irish Members has been alluded to and urged as a reason for the postponement of this Bill. The measure has been down for a considerable time, and every Member of the House must have been fully aware that it was coming on to-day. If the Irish Members do not consider the Bill to be of sufficient importance to them to be present, that is no reason why the House should postpone the consideration of the Bill because of their absence.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.): I must express my astonishment that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Forest of Dean should have made the remarks he has done. It is only another proof, if proof were needed, that hon. Members sitting on that side of the House have no real sympathy with the working man, but only the idea of punishing owners of property.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE asked the hon. Member in what way he had gathered that impression.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS: I am not to be intimidated by the interruptions of the right hon. Gentleman in any remarks I have to make. I know he has been in the House longer than I have, and on more than one occasion he has interrupted me when I have attempted to address the House, and, as a young Member, of course I feel it very keenly. I am one of those who have always supported the Government and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies in their efforts from time to time to deal with this question and to extend this principle, but one of the small points upon which I was not in accord with my party was the omission of the agricultural labourer from those who were to enjoy the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act. There seems to be a desire on the part of the Opposition to delay the passage of this Bill, and the reason, no doubt, is that, having assented to the Second Reading because it was not convenient to divide against it, they are now, at the present stage, endeavouring to smother the measure in their embraces. The House is absolutely at one in the view that the agricultural labourer ought to enjoy the same privileges as those included within the operations of the present Act, but it would be an extraordinary proposition, and one which finds no parallel in the existing law, that the owner of the property, although he is not the employer, should be made responsible for the accident, because the employer of the person injured is not in a sufficiently solvent position to meet the claims which may be made upon him. One of the most amusing of the reasons put forward to delay the passing of this Bill is that of the absence of the Irish Members. If this House is to delay the passing of beneficent legislation because Irish Members do not think fit to attend, motions for adjournment will be most constant, especially when matters vitally affecting the Empire are brought forward. Personally, I should be the first to assist hon. Members from Ireland if I thought any injustice was being done to them, but I fail to see any legitimate argument based upon the fact of their absence.

MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorganshire, Rhondda) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS: I am delighted to find that there is, at any rate, one Member from Wales who is in earnest on this matter, but if he is really anxious that this measure should be passed into law, I am sure he will not wish to burke discussion upon it, unless he feels that that discussion will tend to open the eyes of the people as to the way in which this Bill is being treated by certain Members of this House. With some experience of the working of the older Act, I am glad to think that the Standing Committee have made this Bill what I may call a short Bill and, as far as Acts of Parliament can be, one that is fairly easy to understand. We are all familiar with the number of appeals which have from time to time been brought before the Courts and carried to the final Court of Appeal at great expense to the working classes. I must express the hope that nothing will induce the Government to alter the view they have expressed as to "habitual" employment. In my opinion that word is a most material portion of the measure, but it might be well that that word "habitual" should be dealt with in some explanatory way, otherwise there will probably be some expensive test case with regard to the matter. When we deal with the question of the servant of the small employer, who is in some counties the first person to be considered, I do not see how he can look or hope for inclusion. Unfortunately the tendency in all departments is for the small man to be pushed out. With all respect to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean, his remarks with regard to State insurance are quite beyond the subject. We have not yet come to a position in this country when State insurance can be undertaken, and all we can do is to ensure for the agricultural labourers the same privileges as are possessed by the workmen in towns. The provision in Clause 1 that the occupier shall be deemed to be the undertaker within the meaning of the Act is, I venture to think, as far as this principle can be carried, and if it is carried out in a spirit of perfect justice to the workman and a spirit of equity to the small employer of labour in agriculture, the latter will suffer no more than the small employer of labour in towns is suffering, and must naturally suffer, under this Act if his machinery is deficient. As a lawyer I object to what I may call loose and careless drafting which will lead to a great amount of unnecessary litigation. I should like these points dealt with in an explanatory clause, so that the County Court Judges may have some idea of what the legislature in its wisdom meant. Lord Justice Smith, in dealing with the Workmen's Compensation Act, has made some remarks which are the reverse of complimentary to the wisdom of Parliament. [Opposition cries of "Hear, hear!"] I am glad to find that there are hon. Members on the opposite side of the House who agree with Lord Justice Smith in the attention which he has drawn to this question. I would suggest that the House should deal fully and clearly with the words and specify clearly what is meant. With regard to the 15th line of the Bill the expression "workman"—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is following a rather unusual course in discussing all the Amendments on the Paper upon the motion that this Bill be now considered.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS: I will not dwell further upon that point, but on behalf of the London Members and of those who take a great interest in this principle, I trust the House will, without further delay, agree to the Amendment which has been moved.

Question put, and agreed to. Bill considered.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: When this Bill was before the Standing Committee on Trade, at the conclusion of the proceedings of that Committee I asked the senior Law Officer of the Crown whether the word "workman" which appears in line 6 and line 9 meant the same thing in each case, and he said there was a very considerable difficulty in the interpretation of the word, and he was doubtful whether it meant the same thing in the second case as in the first, and he promised to consider that point.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): When was that statement made?

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: It was at the conclusion of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Trade that I raised this point. For the purpose of asking a question upon this point as to the meaning of the word "workman," I propose to move an Amendment to leave out the word "workman" at the end of line 6 and insert the word "labourer." The word "workman" is employed in line 6 to define the persons who are to receive the benefit of the Act. In line 9 the word "workman" is again used, but in a different sense, for there it provides for persons who "habitually employ for hire one or more workmen," and those persons are to be deemed employers from whom compensation may be claimed. My first question is whether it is the intention of the Government that the word "workman" should mean the same thing in the first case and in the second case, and whether the word "workman" shall have one meaning in the whole of this Bill. In line 15 there is a definition of the word

"workman," which provides that "the expression 'workman' in the case of agriculture, means every labourer in agriculture." I understand that the motion is to be made to leave out those words. It is also provided that this Bill is to be read as one with the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, but in that Act the word "workman" means something quite different from what it means at common law. In that Act the term "workman" includes persons who obtain their living "by manual labour or otherwise." That provision immensely extends the definition of "workman," as it has hitherto existed. The words "or otherwise," which are to be read as one with this Act include clerks in the employment of firms, and I should like to know if that is the intention in this Bill. Possibly the courts might interpret the words in a different way. I want to know whether the word "workman" has the same meaning in line 6 as it has in line 9, where it is again used. In the first case you are dealing with the man who obtains the advantage of the Bill, and in the second place you are dealing with the man who has to pay compensation under this Bill. When I put this question on the Standing Committee on Trade I put a concrete case. In the cider industry there are people employed in pressing. The small occupier takes apples from other persons and manufactures them into cider, and he employs workmen really in a workshop, and who are not workmen engaged in agriculture under the words contained in line 15. Are those men to be included in the term "workmen" in line 9? That is a plain question with a plain concrete illustration. This Act is to be read as one with the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and there the definition of "workman" is different to that given at common law. My contention is that three different meanings are attached to the word "workman"—one by the original Act, one in line 6, and another different one in line 9. This matter is one so vital to the working of this Bill that it ought to be cleared up and placed beyond all doubt, because it is probable that lawyers with the definition of "workman" contained in line 15 would construe the word "workman" as meaning something different in lines 6 and 9. It is an important point, because the wider the meaning of the word "workman" in line 9, the wider will be the effect of this Bill. If you limit it to workmen employed in agriculture the measure will be much narrower in its operation.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 6, to leave out the word 'workman,' and insert the word 'labourers' instead thereof."—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'workman' stand part of the Bill."

MR. GRANT LAWSON: When this Bill was before the Grand Committee I looked up a great many books of law to ascertain the various terms that could be used. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman's proposal is to leave out the word "workman" and insert the word "labourer."

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: No. I am quite indifferent as to the word used, and I have merely suggested the word "labourer" for the purpose of raising the question.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: If the word "labourer" is adopted it will lead to very great confusion indeed. I find that in the case of Morgan v. The London General Omnibus Company a labourer is described as—

It is obviously intended that a bailiff should come under this Act, and if the word "labourer" is left in the Bill a bailiff would be excluded from the benefits of the Act. In the case of Lowther v. Radnor, Chief Justice Ellenborough decided—

"Neither would a labourer include a skilled artisan, there being, as I take it, a distinction between a journeyman in any art, trade, or mystery, or other workmen employed in the different branches of it, and a labourer."

Then, again, it was stated in the case of The Queen v. Sibrishi that—

"It is doubtful whether the word 'labourer' in the Sunday Act extends to an agricultural labourer."

So that it is clear that the word "labourer" seems to have troubled the Courts, and if you put in this Bill the word "labourer" it will certainly be brought up again for the reconsideration of the Courts. There is one expression, however, which has been interpreted by the Courts, and the House will agree that we should try to get a definition which has been before the Courts. If we do that we shall get a judicial opinion without having to pay for it. The expression "servant in husbandry" occurs in a great many Acts of Parliament; it occurs in the definition of "workmen" in the Employers' and Workmen's Act of 1875, in the definition of "workmen" in the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, and in the Truck Act of 1887. So that it is an expression with which the Courts are familiar. In one case quoted in Stroud's Judicial Dictionary the definition given of a "servant in husbandry" is—

"A person, whether male or female, whose chief employment is in the work of husbandry—that is, the culture or keeping of the ground, or the management, or working of horses or cattle, or the gathering in of crops or any other work strictly pertaining to the manual labour required by farmers. Therefore a farm bailiff is not, but a dairymaid, who also does household work, is a servant in husbandry."

That is a judicial decision given in the Queen's Bench, and which would guide any future Queen's Bench decision. I venture to suggest to my right hon. friend the Attorney General that he should consider whether it would not be as well to adopt in this Bill the expression "servant in husbandry."

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I think my hon. and learned friend who has just spoken has given conclusive reasons against the introduction or retention in the Bill of the expression "labourer." It is highly undesirable to have any definition like that in this Bill, lest we raise again in the Courts disputes regarding its interpretation. I cannot say, however, that my hon. and learned friend has converted me to the proposal that he has made in regard to the phrase "servant in husbandry." He began with a quotation from a most interesting and valuable work by Mr. Stroud, a work on the English language employed by Judges. The expression "servant employed in husbandry" has received definition from the Courts several times; but we are now dealing with the principal Act of 1897, and surely it is much better to retain the expression which is defined by that Act, and which it is fortunate has not yet given rise to any controversy. I think everyone in this House, whether lawyer or layman, will agree to retain an expression which has that recommendation. In answer to the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, I have to say that of course the Bill is subject to amendment at the hands of the House on Report stage, and the ultimate construction of the Bill must depend on the way it emerges from the Report stage. But assuming that the word "labourer" is to be eliminated from the Bill, I should say that the word "workman" in the Bill will be read as in the principal Act, for this Bill is to be read along with the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: In both cases?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: Yes, in both cases. There "workman" includes "every person who is engaged in an employment to which this Act applies, whether by way of manual labour or otherwise, and whether his agreement is one of service or apprenticeship or otherwise, and is expressed or implied, is oral, or in writing." The limitation would be if he is a workman employed in agriculture, and that means that agriculture is his principal employment. In regard to a workman engaged in making cider, if the person was an agricultural workman engaged in the operations of agriculture, and only on occasion used in the manufacture of apples into cider, he would fall under the section as it probably will emerge from the Report stage. His principal employment would be agriculture; his employment in cider-making would be only occasional. If, on the other hand, the person was not employed in agriculture, but was engaged in the manufacture of the cider, he would not be an agricultural workman within the meaning of the Act.

MR. GALLOWAY: Then the expression in line 16, "every labourer in agriculture," will go out of the Bill?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: Yes.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): The idea of the Government now is to leave the definition of "workman" as it stands in the principal Act?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: Yes.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I may say the object I had in view in formally moving the Amendment has been attained. The reading of the Attorney General is an improvement on what I understood in the Standing Committee. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. GOULDING (Wiltshire, Devizes): Objection was raised in the Grand Committee to the clause as it stands at present, on the ground that it might apply only to farmers and might not include landlords and other persons, and that it might not bring all classes of employment in agriculture within the Bill. I therefore move, as an Amendment, to leave out the words "the occupier of any farm or premises used wholly or in part for the business of agriculture who habitually employs for hire one or more workmen, and any such occupier shall be deemed an undertaker within the meaning of that Act" (the Act of 1897), and to substitute the words "any employer who habitually employs for hire one or more workmen in such employment." I propose to substitute the term "employer" instead of "occupier," as it will remove these doubts. On the Second Reading both sides of the House recognised the desirability of doing something to safeguard the interest of the small man against the operation of the Bill—the man who is little better off than the agricultural labourer himself. The Government in committee proposed to limit the liabilities to the employer who "habitually" employs, and no one has proposed any other word which will limit less the scope of the Bill. I sincerely hope that the House will accept my Amendment, which, while it safeguards the small man who employs another workman once or twice a year, includes all the larger class of employers.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 7, to leave out from the word 'by' to the word 'Act,' in line 10, inclusive, and insert the words 'any employer who habitually employs for hire one or more workmen in such employment.'"—(Mr. Goulding.)

Mr. Tomlinson.

MR. GALLOWAY: My hon. friend's Amendment will take out the whole definition of "undertaker," which is very important. In the original Act the "undertaker" in every particular trade is defined.

*MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston): It is to be hoped that the House will not accept the Amendment, because it will make a complete alteration in the construction of the Bill, and its effect will be very far reaching. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment has forgotten that this Bill, when passed, is to be read with the principal Act. The Amendment would exclude the operation of the general definition of the word "undertaker"; and the consequence would be that a large portion of the provisions of the original Act which it is intended to apply to agricultural labourers would be absolutely meaningless and inapplicable.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.): I do not quite see how the acceptance of the Amendment would very materially alter the Bill. The object of my hon. friend in proposing the Amendment is to restrict the operation of the Act to a certain extent. It is quite clear that by the Bill as it at present stands compensation might be exacted at the hands of certain employers of labour who are themselves more in need of, and deserve, compensation than to be called upon to pay it. I hope the House will accept the Amendment.

COMMANDER BETHELL (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): There is nothing more certain than that persons who do not habitually, but only occasionally, employ labour will not insure against the possibility of accidents, and if an accident did occur it would be very serious for them. We have got to deal with people as they are, and not as they ought to be. My hon. friend, in proposing his Amendment, seeks to remove a blot on the Bill. I do not quite know whether the phraseology is right—whether we ought to say "usually" or "habitually." It seems to me that "habitually" either goes too far or not far enough, and some other word might be employed.

MR. CRIPPS (Gloucestershire, Stroud): I hope that this Amendment will be adopted, as it will extend the scope of the Act, and get rid of undesirable technicality.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I quite agree with my hon. and learned friend that the effect of the Amendment will be to extend the operation of the Bill. For instance, suppose land is in the occupation of a tenant but the timber is reserved for the landlord, and the landlord is having his timber cut, that would be an operation of agriculture within the intention of the Bill. But, if we retained the Bill as it came from the Standing Committee, it would be impossible to say that the landlord who employed the men to cut the timber was in the occupation of the farm, so as to be liable if any accident took place. By getting rid of the expression "occupier" we get rid of a host of difficulties. Take another case. A man who has bought a growing crop on a farm is not an occupier when he sends men to reap it. Other cases of doubt might be suggested, but sufficient have been quoted to show that there is something to be said for the proposed Amendment. The principal Act deals with employers, and uses the expression in the first section that "the employer shall be liable to pay compensation." But when you come to the end of the Act the employer is defined as meaning the undertaker in respect to certain enterprises—railways, factories, quarries, laundries, mines, and buildings. The reason of that is obvious. The scope of the Act of 1897 was, for reasons sufficient to Parliament, limited to these particular undertakings. The reasons for adopting the language of the original Act in the present Bill are overwhelming.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid): I agree with what the Attorney General has said, that the language of the Amendment is much better than in the clause as it stands, because it extends the operation of the Bill. The learned Attorney General did not deal with the last three words of the Amendment, "in such employment," which seem to me to restrict the operation of the Act somewhat. The right hon. Gentleman says that the word "workman" in line 9 was intended by the Government to be wider than that in line 7.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: On the contrary, I said the interpretation of the word "workman" would be the same in both lines, and the same as is defined in the principal Act.

MR. S. T. EVANS: I understood the Attorney General to say in answer to the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean that it would be better to preserve the term "workman" in line 9 because it would have a more extended meaning than in line 7.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: What I said was that the word "workman" was used in the same sense as in the principal Act, and that it would include persons engaged in agriculture who do not work with their hands.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): The Amendment as it stands does two things: it turns "undertaker" out of the Bill, and puts in "employer" instead of "occupier." If "undertaker" is turned out of the Bill, a deal of reconstruction will be required, and something like Clause 4 of the original Act in regard to contractors will have to be introduced. For instance, if an owner of property employs persons to erect fences or gates, surely these ought to be included within the scope of a Bill like this, but they would not be in the Bill as it at present stands.

Question put and negatived.

Remaining words omitted.

*MR. STRACHEY: My object in moving to leave out "habitually" is to make the clause wider, and not to restrict the advantages to be derived under the Act to agricultural labourers on big farms, and to prevent even on big farms the exclusion of men who thatch, drain, and do other work which is not by its nature continuous. When discussing the Bill earlier in the day the objection to this state of things was met by saying that we were only dealing with cases where a labourer employs another labourer, but

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I am sure that the House will cordially accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the Government are prepared to do all they can to give effect to the Bill. I was a little disappointed, however, that the right hon. Gentleman has not given a more favourable reception to the appeal of my right hon. friend that the Government should themselves take charge of the Bill and find the necessary time for its passing. Everyone must feel that this is one of the most important Bills of the session, if not the most important. Its operation will be very wide, and no doubt it is a measure which will lead to a great deal of controversy. The right hon. Gentleman ought therefore to take the responsibility of ultimately passing the Bill, for, after all, it is the Board of Agriculture that ought to be held responsible by the agricultural labourers and the country for the framework of the Bill. They were responsible for the Compensation Bill. There is no doubt that the private Member in this case has performed an extremely valuable duty in bringing to the birth a measure which but for him would never have seen the light. Then the nurse of the Bill ought to be the Government, and they ought to see that the Bill is brought to maturity in a form which will give satisfaction. I know I have been a party to the ousting of private Members from a great deal of their time, but when there is a Bill of this kind which has reached this stage I do think that the right hon. Gentleman below the gangway is right in saying that the Government ought to undertake it. I venture to say that they have no Bill in reserve of anything like the importance of this. This Bill, as my right hon. friend has said, must take a considerable time in discussion. There will be discussion, for instance on the one word "habitually" in the Bill. You cannot expect that these controversies will not take some time. There will be a great deal of difference of opinion on this subject. I confess that I take a very considerable interest in the Bill that is immediately to follow this Bill. I understand that private Members are to be deprived during the rest of the session of Wednesdays, with two exceptions, and I think the time now at the disposal of private Members ought to be relieved of curtailment by the Government undertaking to watch over the further progress of this Bill. If the Government will only undertake the conduct of this Bill, as they have done more or less in the Grand Committee, then, I think, a difficulty will be removed.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. This subject is one eminently suitable for treatment by a private Member. It is a question on which both political parties are agreed, and the only thing to do is to so carefully word the Bill as to carry out what we all desire. Surely that is a matter that may be taken in hand by private Members. From my hon. friend's speech, I gather that his opposition to the Bill before the House is based on his opinion, not that so many agricultural labourers will be excluded from the operation of the Bill, but rather that so many agricultural labourers who are interested will not receive compensation. I am one of those who put down in Grand Committee this limitation which has been adopted by the Government. I put it down then and I support it now because of the difficulty which would arise in the payment of compensation by small and occasional employers. These small holders who occasionally employ a man to do an occasional job have no wage bill, and it is no good telling them they can insure against their liability. The premium may amount to only a few shillings on £100 of wages, but where the wage bill does not amount to £100 in ten years any premium would be a very substantial increase to the sum the man has to pay. It is an unfortunate necessity that any agricultural labourer should have to stand outside the benefits of this Act. We might consider whether the number who would be so excluded would be large or small. Such a point does not affect the principle of the matter, but it does affect the practical consideration of the question. In the first place, I doubt very much whether there are a large number of labourers in this country who always work in casual agricultural employment. The hon. Member for South Somerset rather suggests that the men who only casually employ a labourer form the larger part of the farmers. It is almost impossible to call such men farmers at all. The man we propose to protect is a man who is practically a labourer himself. There are hundreds such in every country district; they work one day for themselves on their own allotments or gardens, and the next day perhaps work for their neighbour on his allotment or garden. It would be absurd to say if A was working on the plot of B on Monday and was injured, B should compensate him, whereas if B the next day was working on A's plot and was injured, the compensation should be the other way. It seems almost impossible to adopt such a suggestion as that. But will the accidents in regard to the casual employment of such very small men as that be numerous? I am glad to think that the number of accidents in rural districts is very small compared with the number of accidents in almost any other employment. Agriculture may not be remunerative, but it is more or less safe. If there are accidents they occur mainly from three sources, namely, the use of machinery, the use of spirited horses, or from the liability of men to fall from high stacks or ricks. In the case of these very small men machinery is not employed, so that that source of danger may be excluded from the point we are considering. Nor are their horses spirited. They usually have but one horse, and it is generally of a chastened spirit. I do not suggest that the owner does not take proper care of it, but it has much work to do, and such horses do not bring about accidents by their high spirits. Then the stacks of these men are not high. I wish these men had more to put into their stacks, but as a matter of fact the stacks are not very high, so that that source of danger to the agricultural labourer does not apply. The hon. Member for South Somerset said there was no fund from which compensation could properly be drawn, and he suggested that the landowners should pay. I believe there are some owners who do, as a matter of fact, insure the workmen of their tenants. But I see a very practical difficulty in the case of these casual labourers on very small holdings. Insurance companies base their rates of premium on the wages bill. One fills in a schedule of the amount of wages it is anticipated will be paid in the year, and at the end of the year that is adjusted with the company. If you have paid more wages you pay a little more premium; if you have paid less wages the company makes you an allowance. But how could that be done in the case of a landowner insuring the casual labourers of his very small tenants? He would have to go round and ask every single cottager on his estate how many times he had had A or B to do a job for him and paid him a shilling or two for his services, and the making up of a wages bill would be a matter of considerable practical difficulty. Moreover, if I was a director of an insurance company, which I am not, I should say, "We insure you employers against accidents to workmen, but we rely on your exercising some discretion as to the men you employ." Now, if a landowner indirectly insures the labourer of his very small tenant, he has no control over that labourer. He might be a man whose intemperance was such that it was extremely probable to bring about an accident, and I very much doubt whether insurance companies would undertake to insure owners against accidents to men over whom they had no control whatever. But these poor men, whose case we are considering, will not go absolutely without any help. The great friendly societies of the country provide accident funds, and a man, if he belonged to one of these societies, would be able to go on the funds of his society. It is one of the glories of this Parliament that we have provided so much compensation for so many workmen who are injured in the course of their employment, and that we have done it by encouraging the system of insurance, without injuring the employers. We should, however, be doing harm and not good to the labouring population if we taught them to throw all their cares on the Government and to make no provision for accidents happening to themselves. If any labourer said, "I am so fully insured under the Workmen's Compensation Act that I need not continue my subscription to my club," he would be acting foolishly, because an accident may happen to him when he is working on his own plot or allotment, or when he is not working for anybody at all, and then if he has taken his name off his club he will receive no compensation whatever. The hon. Member for South Somerset says that we should look closely at the words of this Bill. That is very true, especially as regards the third version of the words which has been laid before us for carrying out the object we all desire. I have compared the Bill as brought into this House with the Bill as it left the Grand Committee, and I think there are only about five words in the first operative clause which are in the same position now as when the Bill was read a second time. We have, therefore, an entirely different wording from that which we originally had to consider. I go a step further. If anybody will look at the Amendments on the Paper they will see that the Amendments proposed by the promoters of the Bill will again so change the substance, at any rate, of the wording as to make this a third Bill brought in during the present session. That being so, it is practically before us to consider which of the three wordings carry out our intentions in the best and wisest form. That is surely a matter, considering the greatness of the subject, which might absorb the attention and energy of this House upon this Wednesday afternoon. I am very glad that, whether on account of this or some other Bill, there is so large an attendance on this occasion, because in the multitude of counsellors that I see present perhaps we shall have an accumulation of wisdom. It is an opportunity for getting this Bill into the very best phraseology—a phraseology which even lawyers will understand, so that they will not have to fight over the meaning of it in the Courts; and to get such a phraseology as that will be a very worthy use of a Wednesday afternoon.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester): With regard to the small employer, my opinion and experience differ entirely from the view put forward by the hon. Member for Thirsk. The small employer is the man who has the worst machinery, the worst plant, and the most inefficient appliances; and also with regard to the one horse kept by these small employers my experience is different from that of the hon. Member. These men have not means adequate for the proper conduct of their business, and they have to buy horses that nobody else will buy; they have not the money to buy a good horse, so they get a "jibber," and a "jibber" is the most dangerous of all. I would much rather deal with the most spirited horse than with a "jibber." The most terrifying few minutes of my life during recent years were the result of the action of the only horse of one of these small farmers. My life, whatever it was worth, was in great danger, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I earnestly wished there were no such horses in the hands of small holders. A man is much safer in the employ of a large farmer than of a small employer. That of a large corporation is always the safest service in which to be engaged. The man serving under a farmer who only occasionally employs labour is under far more dangerous conditions than the man serving under a farmer who habitually employs labour; therefore the only logical course is to omit altogether the word "habitual." But I understand that to attempt to force that is to wreck the Bill. That is the position taken up by the Government, and I am not prepared to do anything calculated to have that effect. If there are any means of improving the measure without endangering its passage I will support them. On this Report stage I shall take precisely the same action as I took in the Grand Committee—namely, that of adopting such policy as I think is best calculated to ensure the passing of the Bill. The sensible appeal made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean does not appear to find favour with the only representative of the Cabinet present; therefore I take it that we must go on with the Bill, for the position is that we must have the Bill to-day or not at all. I am for having the Bill with all its defects. In this Bill, as in most Bills, there are many defects; this Bill to a large degree is full of defects. I entirely adopt the view of the hon. Member for South Somerset, that a very large number of labourers will be excluded from its scope. It is all very well to ask for statistics; it is easier to ask than to supply; but we all know that with regard to the Act of 1897 probably the larger proportion of the workers are outside of it. With regard to this present Bill probably the larger part of the agricultural labourers will come within its scope, but there will yet be a large number excluded. If the Government would agree to the omission of the word "habitual" I think they would make this a better, stronger, and more logical Bill. On the other hand, I recognise the danger of imposing upon a man who is himself only a labourer in degree the fearful responsibility which might be imposed upon him by the omission of the word "habitual"; and that brings me to this one point. In 1897 I expressed the opinion that there would be no final settlement of this question of compensation until a part or the whole of the compensation due to the workers was paid by the State. That is the only resting place, and to that point it will, in my judgment, ultimately come. There is no sound argument against it, and it will be impossible to give the workers full compensation until some measure of that kind is passed into law. I exceedingly regret the exclusion which will occur under these words. An accident is an accident and a loss is a loss, whether it is met with in the service of a poor or of a rich employer. This measure does not do all that we want, but we shall have to take what we can get, and I sincerely trust that such a policy may prevail this afternoon as will see the Bill through in an hour or so, so that we may get on to another interesting subject.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): When the Bill was before the Standing Committee the hon. Member for South Somersetshire and the hon. Member for the Lichfield Division were the only members of the committee who supported the proposal for solving the problem of bringing the whole body of agricultural labourers within its scope, by throwing the liability upon the owner of the land instead of upon the employer; and amongst others, the hon. Members for Leicester, Morpeth, and Battersea voted against this Amendment. They knew perfectly well that such a proposal was inconsistent with the principle of the original Act, which was that the burden should fall upon the employers actually interested, so as to make them feel pecuniarily the responsibility of looking after the safety of those whom they employed. In the discussions on the Act of 1897 representatives of the working men insisted over and over again that their object was not to obtain money compensation, but to secure greater safety of employment. The proposal under discussion would make this Bill not an extension of the Act of 1897, but a reversal of the principle of that measure.

MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham): With regard to the suggestion that exceptional measures should be adopted for the passage of this Bill, there will be plenty of time, if it is found that Wednesday is not sufficient, for the right hon. Baronet then to urge the Government to take other steps. There is no reason to depart now from the usual course and to take a private Member's Bill out of its regular place on the Paper in the midst of the discussion, especially when we have at least three hours for its consideration. I am glad that we have this opportunity of discussing what is undoubtedly an extremely important measure. I am rather inclined to agree that a certain number of workmen will be excluded from the operation of this Bill. I am sorry the hon. Member opposite did not give any statistics or grounds for that supposition; I was most anxious to hear on what he founded that belief. But undoubtedly the inclusion of the word "habitual" must to a certain extent deprive a number of men of the benefits of this measure. In 1897, when the Workmen's Compensation Bill was before the House, I voted against the inclusion of agricultural labourers within the scope of that measure, because I thought that agriculture was in such an extremely bad condition that it would not be able to stand the heavy charges which such an inclusion would involve. Since then we have seen that the cost of insurance is considerably less than was anticipated, and that on the whole the Act of 1897 has worked well. It seems to me, therefore, that we have good ground for bringing the agricultural labourers within the operation of the Act. But if you bring in agricultural labourers at all I cannot conceive why every agricultural labourer should not be brought in. The agricultural labourer employed by a small man may be injured just as seriously as the man employed by the big farmer, but if the word "habitual" is left in he will not get the benefits of the Act. The object is to include all men who are injured in the course of their avocation, and therefore I hope that, if, as I understand, the Amendment to leave out the word "habitual" cannot be accepted, some means may be found by which these men will not be deprived of the benefits we wish to see extended to them. I cannot agree with the suggestion that the charge should be put upon the landowners. The effect of such a course would be to discourage care on the part of farmers in seeing that their appliances were in good order and in doing everything they could to enable their labourers to carry out their work without injury, as there would be no incentive to the farmer to take ordinary precautions. Nor can I agree with the hon. Member for Thirsk that in every instance the poor employer has the best appliances. I rather agree with the hon. Member for Leicester on that point, though I do not believe that the "jibbing" horse is such a dangerous animal as he would have us suppose. I have had several such horses myself, and it is my belief that the "jibbing" can be cured if the horse is treated properly. The absence of the Irish Members has been alluded to and urged as a reason for the postponement of this Bill. The measure has been down for a considerable time, and every Member of the House must have been fully aware that it was coming on to-day. If the Irish Members do not consider the Bill to be of sufficient importance to them to be present, that is no reason why the House should postpone the consideration of the Bill because of their absence.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.): I must express my astonishment that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Forest of Dean should have made the remarks he has done. It is only another proof, if proof were needed, that hon. Members sitting on that side of the House have no real sympathy with the working man, but only the idea of punishing owners of property.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE asked the hon. Member in what way he had gathered that impression.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS: I am not to be intimidated by the interruptions of the right hon. Gentleman in any remarks I have to make. I know he has been in the House longer than I have, and on more than one occasion he has interrupted me when I have attempted to address the House, and, as a young Member, of course I feel it very keenly. I am one of those who have always supported the Government and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies in their efforts from time to time to deal with this question and to extend this principle, but one of the small points upon which I was not in accord with my party was the omission of the agricultural labourer from those who were to enjoy the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act. There seems to be a desire on the part of the Opposition to delay the passage of this Bill, and the reason, no doubt, is that, having assented to the Second Reading because it was not convenient to divide against it, they are now, at the present stage, endeavouring to smother the measure in their embraces. The House is absolutely at one in the view that the agricultural labourer ought to enjoy the same privileges as those included within the operations of the present Act, but it would be an extraordinary proposition, and one which finds no parallel in the existing law, that the owner of the property, although he is not the employer, should be made responsible for the accident, because the employer of the person injured is not in a sufficiently solvent position to meet the claims which may be made upon him. One of the most amusing of the reasons put forward to delay the passing of this Bill is that of the absence of the Irish Members. If this House is to delay the passing of beneficent legislation because Irish Members do not think fit to attend, motions for adjournment will be most constant, especially when matters vitally affecting the Empire are brought forward. Personally, I should be the first to assist hon. Members from Ireland if I thought any injustice was being done to them, but I fail to see any legitimate argument based upon the fact of their absence.

MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorganshire, Rhondda) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS: I am delighted to find that there is, at any rate, one Member from Wales who is in earnest on this matter, but if he is really anxious that this measure should be passed into law, I am sure he will not wish to burke discussion upon it, unless he feels that that discussion will tend to open the eyes of the people as to the way in which this Bill is being treated by certain Members of this House. With some experience of the working of the older Act, I am glad to think that the Standing Committee have made this Bill what I may call a short Bill and, as far as Acts of Parliament can be, one that is fairly easy to understand. We are all familiar with the number of appeals which have from time to time been brought before the Courts and carried to the final Court of Appeal at great expense to the working classes. I must express the hope that nothing will induce the Government to alter the view they have expressed as to "habitual" employment. In my opinion that word is a most material portion of the measure, but it might be well that that word "habitual" should be dealt with in some explanatory way, otherwise there will probably be some expensive test case with regard to the matter. When we deal with the question of the servant of the small employer, who is in some counties the first person to be considered, I do not see how he can look or hope for inclusion. Unfortunately the tendency in all departments is for the small man to be pushed out. With all respect to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean, his remarks with regard to State insurance are quite beyond the subject. We have not yet come to a position in this country when State insurance can be undertaken, and all we can do is to ensure for the agricultural labourers the same privileges as are possessed by the workmen in towns. The provision in Clause 1 that the occupier shall be deemed to be the undertaker within the meaning of the Act is, I venture to think, as far as this principle can be carried, and if it is carried out in a spirit of perfect justice to the workman and a spirit of equity to the small employer of labour in agriculture, the latter will suffer no more than the small employer of labour in towns is suffering, and must naturally suffer, under this Act if his machinery is deficient. As a lawyer I object to what I may call loose and careless drafting which will lead to a great amount of unnecessary litigation. I should like these points dealt with in an explanatory clause, so that the County Court Judges may have some idea of what the legislature in its wisdom meant. Lord Justice Smith, in dealing with the Workmen's Compensation Act, has made some remarks which are the reverse of complimentary to the wisdom of Parliament. [Opposition cries of "Hear, hear!"] I am glad to find that there are hon. Members on the opposite side of the House who agree with Lord Justice Smith in the attention which he has drawn to this question. I would suggest that the House should deal fully and clearly with the words and specify clearly what is meant. With regard to the 15th line of the Bill the expression "workman"—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is following a rather unusual course in discussing all the Amendments on the Paper upon the motion that this Bill be now considered.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS: I will not dwell further upon that point, but on behalf of the London Members and of those who take a great interest in this principle, I trust the House will, without further delay, agree to the Amendment which has been moved.

Question put, and agreed to. Bill considered.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: When this Bill was before the Standing Committee on Trade, at the conclusion of the proceedings of that Committee I asked the senior Law Officer of the Crown whether the word "workman" which appears in line 6 and line 9 meant the same thing in each case, and he said there was a very considerable difficulty in the interpretation of the word, and he was doubtful whether it meant the same thing in the second case as in the first, and he promised to consider that point.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): When was that statement made?

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: It was at the conclusion of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Trade that I raised this point. For the purpose of asking a question upon this point as to the meaning of the word "workman," I propose to move an Amendment to leave out the word "workman" at the end of line 6 and insert the word "labourer." The word "workman" is employed in line 6 to define the persons who are to receive the benefit of the Act. In line 9 the word "workman" is again used, but in a different sense, for there it provides for persons who "habitually employ for hire one or more workmen," and those persons are to be deemed employers from whom compensation may be claimed. My first question is whether it is the intention of the Government that the word "workman" should mean the same thing in the first case and in the second case, and whether the word "workman" shall have one meaning in the whole of this Bill. In line 15 there is a definition of the word

"workman," which provides that "the expression 'workman' in the case of agriculture, means every labourer in agriculture." I understand that the motion is to be made to leave out those words. It is also provided that this Bill is to be read as one with the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, but in that Act the word "workman" means something quite different from what it means at common law. In that Act the term "workman" includes persons who obtain their living "by manual labour or otherwise." That provision immensely extends the definition of "workman," as it has hitherto existed. The words "or otherwise," which are to be read as one with this Act include clerks in the employment of firms, and I should like to know if that is the intention in this Bill. Possibly the courts might interpret the words in a different way. I want to know whether the word "workman" has the same meaning in line 6 as it has in line 9, where it is again used. In the first case you are dealing with the man who obtains the advantage of the Bill, and in the second place you are dealing with the man who has to pay compensation under this Bill. When I put this question on the Standing Committee on Trade I put a concrete case. In the cider industry there are people employed in pressing. The small occupier takes apples from other persons and manufactures them into cider, and he employs workmen really in a workshop, and who are not workmen engaged in agriculture under the words contained in line 15. Are those men to be included in the term "workmen" in line 9? That is a plain question with a plain concrete illustration. This Act is to be read as one with the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and there the definition of "workman" is different to that given at common law. My contention is that three different meanings are attached to the word "workman"—one by the original Act, one in line 6, and another different one in line 9. This matter is one so vital to the working of this Bill that it ought to be cleared up and placed beyond all doubt, because it is probable that lawyers with the definition of "workman" contained in line 15 would construe the word "workman" as meaning something different in lines 6 and 9. It is an important point, because the wider the meaning of the word "workman" in line 9, the wider will be the effect of this Bill. If you limit it to workmen employed in agriculture the measure will be much narrower in its operation.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 6, to leave out the word 'workman,' and insert the word 'labourers' instead thereof."—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'workman' stand part of the Bill."

MR. GRANT LAWSON: When this Bill was before the Grand Committee I looked up a great many books of law to ascertain the various terms that could be used. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman's proposal is to leave out the word "workman" and insert the word "labourer."

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: No. I am quite indifferent as to the word used, and I have merely suggested the word "labourer" for the purpose of raising the question.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: If the word "labourer" is adopted it will lead to very great confusion indeed. I find that in the case of Morgan v. The London General Omnibus Company a labourer is described as—

It is obviously intended that a bailiff should come under this Act, and if the word "labourer" is left in the Bill a bailiff would be excluded from the benefits of the Act. In the case of Lowther v. Radnor, Chief Justice Ellenborough decided—

"Neither would a labourer include a skilled artisan, there being, as I take it, a distinction between a journeyman in any art, trade, or mystery, or other workmen employed in the different branches of it, and a labourer."

Then, again, it was stated in the case of The Queen v. Sibrishi that—

"It is doubtful whether the word 'labourer' in the Sunday Act extends to an agricultural labourer."

So that it is clear that the word "labourer" seems to have troubled the Courts, and if you put in this Bill the word "labourer" it will certainly be brought up again for the reconsideration of the Courts. There is one expression, however, which has been interpreted by the Courts, and the House will agree that we should try to get a definition which has been before the Courts. If we do that we shall get a judicial opinion without having to pay for it. The expression "servant in husbandry" occurs in a great many Acts of Parliament; it occurs in the definition of "workmen" in the Employers' and Workmen's Act of 1875, in the definition of "workmen" in the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, and in the Truck Act of 1887. So that it is an expression with which the Courts are familiar. In one case quoted in Stroud's Judicial Dictionary the definition given of a "servant in husbandry" is—

"A person, whether male or female, whose chief employment is in the work of husbandry—that is, the culture or keeping of the ground, or the management, or working of horses or cattle, or the gathering in of crops or any other work strictly pertaining to the manual labour required by farmers. Therefore a farm bailiff is not, but a dairymaid, who also does household work, is a servant in husbandry."

That is a judicial decision given in the Queen's Bench, and which would guide any future Queen's Bench decision. I venture to suggest to my right hon. friend the Attorney General that he should consider whether it would not be as well to adopt in this Bill the expression "servant in husbandry."

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I think my hon. and learned friend who has just spoken has given conclusive reasons against the introduction or retention in the Bill of the expression "labourer." It is highly undesirable to have any definition like that in this Bill, lest we raise again in the Courts disputes regarding its interpretation. I cannot say, however, that my hon. and learned friend has converted me to the proposal that he has made in regard to the phrase "servant in husbandry." He began with a quotation from a most interesting and valuable work by Mr. Stroud, a work on the English language employed by Judges. The expression "servant employed in husbandry" has received definition from the Courts several times; but we are now dealing with the principal Act of 1897, and surely it is much better to retain the expression which is defined by that Act, and which it is fortunate has not yet given rise to any controversy. I think everyone in this House, whether lawyer or layman, will agree to retain an expression which has that recommendation. In answer to the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, I have to say that of course the Bill is subject to amendment at the hands of the House on Report stage, and the ultimate construction of the Bill must depend on the way it emerges from the Report stage. But assuming that the word "labourer" is to be eliminated from the Bill, I should say that the word "workman" in the Bill will be read as in the principal Act, for this Bill is to be read along with the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: In both cases?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: Yes, in both cases. There "workman" includes "every person who is engaged in an employment to which this Act applies, whether by way of manual labour or otherwise, and whether his agreement is one of service or apprenticeship or otherwise, and is expressed or implied, is oral, or in writing." The limitation would be if he is a workman employed in agriculture, and that means that agriculture is his principal employment. In regard to a workman engaged in making cider, if the person was an agricultural workman engaged in the operations of agriculture, and only on occasion used in the manufacture of apples into cider, he would fall under the section as it probably will emerge from the Report stage. His principal employment would be agriculture; his employment in cider-making would be only occasional. If, on the other hand, the person was not employed in agriculture, but was engaged in the manufacture of the cider, he would not be an agricultural workman within the meaning of the Act.

MR. GALLOWAY: Then the expression in line 16, "every labourer in agriculture," will go out of the Bill?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: Yes.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): The idea of the Government now is to leave

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: Yes.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I may say the object I had in view in formally moving the Amendment has been attained. The reading of the Attorney General is an improvement on what I understood in the Standing Committee. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. GOULDING (Wiltshire, Devizes): Objection was raised in the Grand Committee to the clause as it stands at present, on the ground that it might apply only to farmers and might not include landlords and other persons, and that it might not bring all classes of employment in agriculture within the Bill. I therefore move, as an Amendment, to leave out the words "the occupier of any farm or premises used wholly or in part for the business of agriculture who habitually employs for hire one or more workmen, and any such occupier shall be deemed an undertaker within the meaning of that Act" (the Act of 1897), and to substitute the words "any employer who habitually employs for hire one or more workmen in such employment." I propose to substitute the term "employer" instead of "occupier," as it will remove these doubts. On the Second Reading both sides of the House recognised the desirability of doing something to safeguard the interest of the small man against the operation of the Bill—the man who is little better off than the agricultural labourer himself. The Government in committee proposed to limit the liabilities to the employer who "habitually" employs, and no one has proposed any other word which will limit less the scope of the Bill. I sincerely hope that the House will accept my Amendment, which, while it safeguards the small man who employs another workman once or twice a year, includes all the larger class of employers.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 7, to leave out from the word 'by' to the word 'Act,' in line 10, inclusive, and insert the words 'any employer who habitually employs for hire one or more workmen in such employment.'"—(Mr. Goulding.)

Mr. Tomlinson.

MR. GALLOWAY: My hon. friend's Amendment will take out the whole definition of "undertaker," which is very important. In the original Act the "undertaker" in every particular trade is defined.

*MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston): It is to be hoped that the House will not accept the Amendment, because it will make a complete alteration in the construction of the Bill, and its effect will be very far reaching. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment has forgotten that this Bill, when passed, is to be read with the principal Act. The Amendment would exclude the operation of the general definition of the word "undertaker"; and the consequence would be that a large portion of the provisions of the original Act which it is intended to apply to agricultural labourers would be absolutely meaningless and inapplicable.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.): I do not quite see how the acceptance of the Amendment would very materially alter the Bill. The object of my hon. friend in proposing the Amendment is to restrict the operation of the Act to a certain extent. It is quite clear that by the Bill as it at present stands compensation might be exacted at the hands of certain employers of labour who are themselves more in need of, and deserve, compensation than to be called upon to pay it. I hope the House will accept the Amendment.

COMMANDER BETHELL (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): There is nothing more certain than that persons who do not habitually, but only occasionally, employ labour will not insure against the possibility of accidents, and if an accident did occur it would be very serious for them. We have got to deal with people as they are, and not as they ought to be. My hon. friend, in proposing his Amendment, seeks to remove a blot on the Bill. I do not quite know whether the phraseology is right—whether we ought to say "usually" or "habitually." It seems to me that "habitually" either goes too far or not far enough, and some other word might be employed.

MR. CRIPPS (Gloucestershire, Stroud): I hope that this Amendment will be adopted, as it will extend the scope of the Act, and get rid of undesirable technicality.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I quite agree with my hon. and learned friend that the effect of the Amendment will be to extend the operation of the Bill. For instance, suppose land is in the occupation of a tenant but the timber is reserved for the landlord, and the landlord is having his timber cut, that would be an operation of agriculture within the intention of the Bill. But, if we retained the Bill as it came from the Standing Committee, it would be impossible to say that the landlord who employed the men to cut the timber was in the occupation of the farm, so as to be liable if any accident took place. By getting rid of the expression "occupier" we get rid of a host of difficulties. Take another case. A man who has bought a growing crop on a farm is not an occupier when he sends men to reap it. Other cases of doubt might be suggested, but sufficient have been quoted to show that there is something to be said for the proposed Amendment. The principal Act deals with employers, and uses the expression in the first section that "the employer shall be liable to pay compensation." But when you come to the end of the Act the employer is defined as meaning the undertaker in respect to certain enterprises—railways, factories, quarries, laundries, mines, and buildings. The reason of that is obvious. The scope of the Act of 1897 was, for reasons sufficient to Parliament, limited to these particular undertakings. The reasons for adopting the language of the original Act in the present Bill are overwhelming.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid): I agree with what the Attorney General has said, that the language of the Amendment is much better than in the clause as it stands, because it extends the operation of the Bill. The learned Attorney General did not deal with the last three words of the Amendment, "in such employment," which seem to me to restrict the operation of the Act somewhat. The right hon. Gentleman says that the word "workman" in line 9 was intended by the Government to be wider than that in line 7.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: On the contrary, I said the interpretation of the word "workman" would be the same in both lines, and the same as is defined in the principal Act.

MR. S. T. EVANS: I understood the Attorney General to say in answer to the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean that it would be better to preserve the term "workman" in line 9 because it would have a more extended meaning than in line 7.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: What I said was that the word "workman" was used in the same sense as in the principal Act, and that it would include persons engaged in agriculture who do not work with their hands.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): The Amendment as it stands does two things: it turns "undertaker" out of the Bill, and puts in "employer" instead of "occupier." If "undertaker" is turned out of the Bill, a deal of reconstruction will be required, and something like Clause 4 of the original Act in regard to contractors will have to be introduced. For instance, if an owner of property employs persons to erect fences or gates, surely these ought to be included within the scope of a Bill like this, but they would not be in the Bill as it at present stands.

Question put and negatived.

Remaining words omitted.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. STRACHEY: My object in moving to leave out "habitually" is to make the clause wider, and not to restrict the advantages to be derived under the Act to agricultural labourers on big farms, and to prevent even on big farms the exclusion of men who thatch, drain, and do other work which is not by its nature continuous. When discussing the Bill earlier in the day the objection to this state of things was met by saying that we were only dealing with cases where a labourer employs another labourer, but

hon. Members who use such an argument are only trifling with the House. If they are really sincere in what they profess is their object, let them put in, as they could easily do, words which will strictly limit the operation of the Act to such cases. In numberless cases men are only employed on farms during the summer time in the hay and corn harvest, and these would be excluded from receiving compensation for death or injury under this Bill.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

(Mr. Strachey.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'habitually' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

*MR. LONG: I hope the House will not accept this Amendment. Although the hon. Gentleman says it is quite easy to find words to express the limitation, he does not assist the House by proposing such words. The hon. Gentleman suggested that there was a lack of sincerity in the hon. Members who support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Devizes. I think the hon. Gentleman is rather carried away by the excess of his devotion to the interests of the agricultural labourer, and this leads him to disregard the just interest of the agricultural employer. I must say that if this Bill were carried in its present form, a grave injustice would be inflicted upon the smaller class of agricultural employers who are in many cases no better off, from a financial point of view, than the labourers they employ; and that injustice would outdo any benefit the Bill would give to the agricultural labourer. If a claim for compensation were brought against, say, a small farmer with only three or four acres of land, who occasionally casually employed a labourer, it would result in the ruin of the unfortunate man, and there would be a popular outcry against the measure. If this is to be a really beneficial measure there must be a limitation. An obvious difficulty arises in regard to the fact that a man is sometimes employed on purely agricultural work, and at other times on not purely agricultural work. My hon. friend thinks, and the Government agree with him, that these workmen ought to be granted compensation when an accident occurs, whatever the employment they are engaged in at the moment; but there must, in justice, be a limitation. I have no particular admiration for the word "habitually." The Attorney General has carefully considered this, and has sought to find some word that would be agreeable to the House, and more suitable than "habitually"; but no one has as yet succeeded in getting such a word. The hon. Member for Holderness has suggested the word "usually," but I do not know that the word "usually" would be better than "habitually." The word "habitually" means the case where a master is in the regular course of employing labourers on his farm. It does not follow that he employs the same man from the 1st January to the 31st of December, but that it is his regular business as an agricultural employer to have labourers on his farm, and he ought in that case to have the same liability in regard to injuries as other employers of labour. On the other hand it would exclude men who only want assistance occasionally for a day or two. That is the best suggestion that has been made, and I hope the Committee will agree to the Amendment.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford): My objection to the word "habitually" is that a small farmer will be unable to find an insurance company to insure him against the risk of injuries to a labourer whom he cannot define, or about whom he can give no information as to where and when he is to be employed. There are hundreds of small employers who would be ruined if casual labourers were brought within the scope of the Act; and it is absolutely necessary that the word "habitually" should be retained.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): As to the statement of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down that insurance companies would not insure against injuries to occasional labourers, I believe that that is not correct, and that insurance companies will insure such cases. [An HON. MEMBER: The minimum premium is 5s.] That puts the possibility of insurance within the means of small men. Words have been suggested over and over again to protect the small employer, but this not only protects the small employer, but it cuts out a very large proportion of the agricultural labourers throughout the country, and curtails the Bill in a way never originally intended by the promoters. That will be the effect in various parts of the country. There are cases in which a farmer who works his farm with the assistance of a son or two takes on men during the harvest, and in such cases it would be a great hardship if the labourer did not get the benefit of the Bill. As originally introduced it contained none of these curtailments, but the Government and the Minister for Agriculture have nursed it, with the result that it is now restricted as far as it possibly can be. These clauses were not introduced by the promoters of the Bill, but by the Government, who, while professing themselves anxious to carry the Bill, are endeavouring to curtail it as much as possible. I hope my hon. friend will persist in his Amendment, and that he will receive the support of hon. Members on the other side who do not desire that the Bill should be restricted to a small number of agricultural labourers.

COMMANDER BETHELL: May I ask the Attorney General if he thinks in the case of a small employer who does not employ men ordinarily, but only during certain seasons of the year, that the Courts would interpret the word "habitually" so as to bring him within the scope of the Act?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I do not think so. I do not think that occasional employment at a particular time of the year would constitute habitual employment.

COMMANDER BETHELL: Not even if it happened every year?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I do not think that would be habitual employment, even if it happened every year.

Question put.

 Mr. Strachey and Mr.
 Courtenay Warner.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen-shire, W): I should like the Attorney General to consider what the words "employs for hire" mean. Take the case of a farmer who works a farm of 150 acres, and who has no regular servants in his employ, but is assisted by two sons residing at home, who take the place of farm labourers. They receive no fixed wages as remuneration for their services, but they get board and lodging and clothes and a small sum from time to time as pocket money. If I understand the Bill aright, that farmer would not come within the scope of the Bill. Take a second case—that of a farmer with an adjoining farm of smaller size. He has got one boy in regular employment, and it seems to me that unless the words "employs for hire" cover the case of the farmer with one or two sons we may find ourselves in rather an anomalous position after the Bill becomes law, because a man who works a farm to the extent which necessitates the employment of two regular labourers would not come within the scope of the Act, whereas a man with a smaller farm would. That seems to me to be a substantial objection, because I take it that the object of those who are in favour of the Bill is to extend the operation of the Workmen's Compensation Act to as many agricultural labourers as possible.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: Clearly the words "employs for hire" mean employment for wages, for hire means money. They would exclude a case in which assistance was given, although habitually, by sons living with their father at the farmhouse. That would, no doubt, be habitual employment, but not employment for hire unless they were taken on for wages.

MR. S. T. EVANS: I think the answer of the Attorney General renders it necessary to move that these words be omitted. The object of the Bill is to give compensation for workmen's injuries, and if we have the case of a large farm on which possibly two sons are constantly employed, although not for wages, why should they be precluded from obtaining compensation if they are injured? The case is a perfectly simple one, and I think the arguments are overwhelmingly in its favour. I beg to move to leave out the words "for hire."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"To leave out the words 'for hire.'"—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'for hire' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.): I am no lawyer, but it is perfectly apparent that these words ought to be left in, because according to the Act a certain proportion of the wages is to be given to an injured man, and if he gets no wages how can he get any compensation?

MR. S. T. EVANS: That does not refer to the injuries to sons, but to injuries of workmen employed on the same farm.

MR. JEFFREYS: The hon. Gentleman wishes to introduce the sons.

MR. S. T. EVANS: Oh, no!

MR. JEFFREYS: It seems to me perfectly clear that these words "for hire" would limit compensation to men in receipt of wages.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): May I put this case to the Attorney General? Suppose we take a farmer who has two sons habitually working on his farm, but not working for hire; suppose at the busy season, such as the harvest, he takes on additional hands, and during the harvest an accident unfortunately happens to one of them, what will be the position of that labourer? There is no one habitually employed by the farmer, because the two sons are not regarded as labourers working for hire. In the case I have suggested what would be the position of the injured man? Under the Bill, clearly, it seems to me he would have no claim whatever. That is manifestly unfair, and I hope it is not the desire of the Government that it should be the case.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: May I, by permission of the House, answer the question? I agree with the view expressed by the hon. Gentleman. As the Amendment stands at present, unless one or more men are habitually employed for hire, the Act would not apply in the case of a man assisting during a season of the year.

MR. GALLOWAY: I should like to ask the Attorney General whether this Amendment would be affected by the words which I have placed on the Paper—"not being his father or son." Would not that meet the case?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: No; unless there is employment for hire.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Durham, Mid): I hope the Government will see the necessity of accepting this Amendment, otherwise there will be this anomaly: You will have two farms of the same extent, one of which is worked by the farmer with the assistance of his sons and the occasional employment of a labourer; while in the other the farmer has to employ two labourers habitually. Because the first farmer has two sons who are not employed for hire, he is not to come within the Act, whereas the other farmer is. I submit that that would be a most glaring inconsistency. I hope the Government will accept the Amendment, as it would simplify the Bill and make it more just.

*MR. LONG: I hope the House will be willing to agree to the suggestion that these two words should be omitted. I think they constitute a practical difficulty and one which would involve a departure from the standard we have suggested. I think the difficulty would be well met by the adoption of the Amendment, subject, if I may say so, to the Government giving their careful consideration to the removal of these words in order to ascertain that their omission would have no further effect than that desired by the mover of the Amendment—namely, to put a man working a farm with the assistance of his sons in the same position as a man working a farm with hired labour. That does not go beyond the original intention of the Bill.

COMMANDER BETHELL: I would wish to ask the Attorney General to consider whether the point raised by the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division would not be covered if, after the word "habitually," the following words were added, "or at regular seasons." Perhaps the Attorney General would be good enough to give the matter attention when the Bill is under consideration in another place. Words of this kind would meet the points which have been made.

*MR. LONG: I do not think there is any necessity to introduce the words suggested by my hon. and gallant friend.

MR. LOYD (Berkshire, Abingdon) said he desired to point out that the words "for hire" in this clause were intended primarily to confine the benefit of the principal Act to the paid workman. It had now been objected that the indirect effect of those words, occurring where they did, would be to exclude all but paid workmen from being taken into consideration in estimating the position, importance, and responsibility of the employer. It might be well to strike out the words where they had that effect and insert them at a still earlier point in remodelling the clause, which would then run, "From and after the commencement of this Act the Act of 1897 shall apply to the employment for hire of workmen in agriculture."

Question put and negatived.

MR. S. T. EVANS: As I intimated earlier, I will now move the omission of the words "in such employment." I have solid ground for doing so. It is obvious to anyone reading the clause that the insertion of these words will limit the benefits of the Bill very much. I should be very glad if this Amendment had been moved by the promoter of the Bill. I am not at all sure that when these words come to be construed in a court of law they may not be held to mean employment of the particular class or kind in which the accident happened to the workmen. That would enormously limit the benefit of the Act. If these words are left in we may, perhaps, have a man employing a very large number of persons in another employment, and very well able to pay compensation, escaping. These words were not in the Bill as it passed upstairs, and there is no reason why they should be in the Bill now, and I hope the Government will see fit to omit them.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"To leave out the words 'in such employment.'—(Mr. Samuel Evans.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

*MR. LONG: I hope the House will not accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I do not think it is correct to say that the adoption of these words involves a departure from the Bill as amended upstairs, or indeed from the intention of the promoters of the Bill. I have carefully followed the debates, and, as I understand it, the intention of the promoters is that the Workmen's Compensation Act should be extended to agricultural labourers as a body. The Amendment would have precisely the opposite effect to that stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The words which the hon. and learned Gentleman says will bear a certain interpretation are clear enough. I am not a lawyer, but my right hon. and learned friend agrees with that view. The intention of the Bill is to apply the Act to agricultural labourers, and I therefore hope that my hon. friends who are responsible for the introduction of the Bill will not approve of the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite.

Question put, and agreed to.

Words, as amended, inserted.

CAPTAIN PRETYMAN (Suffolk, Woodbridge): Before moving the Amendment which stands in my name, dealing with the question of contracts, I may be allowed to give two or three instances to explain its effect. There are three classes of cases concerned. In the first case, which is common in the east of England, a certain number of the hired men on a farm form themselves into a gang under the leadership of one of themselves, and contract with the employer to carry out the work of the farm, the employer giving them the necessary machinery. In the second case, a similar gang of men, not usually employed by a particular employer, such as sheep-shearers, contract to do work. In these two cases the labourers are banded together for the purpose of taking a contract, and it is certainly desirable that a man who has taken a job by the piece instead of by the day should not be excluded from obtaining compensation for injuries. It is very desirable that these two cases should be included. In the third case the conditions are entirely different. It refers to a man, generally a large contractor, who is in the habit of lending out steam plant, such as threshers, ploughs, and other agricultural machinery. He employs highly paid men to work the machinery. They are not really agricultural labourers, but are in charge of the machinery, and execute work on various farms in a district, being usually assisted by the farm labourers employed by the farmer himself. In this case it certainly appears desirable that the farmer should not be liable for compensation in the case of injury to the servants of the other man, who is probably a good deal better off. Of course any man employed by the farmer himself should be compensated by him. That appears to be a reasonable way of dealing with the matter. In regard to this particular Bill, it is quite evident that there is complete agreement as regards the principle, but when questions of verbiage arise as to whether a particular Amendment would carry out the intention desired, there is great difference of opinion. I think this Amendment, with one slight alteration which I propose to add, would carry out the principle which I have just laid down. It is divided into two sub-sections. The first sub-section deals with the first two cases I referred to—the cases of contracts entered into by the labourers themselves; and the second sub-section deals with the case where a contract is entered into by a farmer to have his work carried out by machinery. I should wish to add to the Amendment as it appears on the Paper, after the word "contractor," the words "provides and." It is very necessary that the contractor should provide the machinery as well as use it. With that explanation, which I think sufficient for the purpose, I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"At the end of Clause 1, to add, '2. Where any such employer agrees with a contractor for the execution by or under that contractor of any work in agriculture, Section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, shall apply in respect of any workman employed in such work as if that employer were an undertaker within the meaning of that Act. Provided that where the contractor provides and uses machinery for the purpose of threshing, ploughing, or other agricultural work, he, and he alone, shall be liable under this Act to pay compensation to any workman employed by him on such work.'"—(Captain Pretymann.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. JOHN WILSON (Durham, Mid): I think we should have some intimation as to the views of the Government on this matter.

*MR. LONG: Certainly. I did not rise, because I thought my hon. friend, in moving the Amendment, had really covered the whole ground. In a case where the farmer contracts with another man to do agricultural work of the class referred to in the proviso, the other man should, we think, be responsible for any accident to the man he employed, for it would be manifestly unjust to throw upon the farmer the burden of compensation in such a case, where he chose to adopt that system of getting his work done. In the same way where an employer employs his own machinery for the purpose of threshing, it would be unjust that he should escape the liability for injuries to his own servants.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said the second part of the Amendment seemed to destroy the first part. He was not an agricultural professor, but he did wish to assist the House, and he thought it would be well if the point he had suggested were considered.

MR. GALLOWAY: But is it so?

*MR. LONG: Certainly not. The clause deals with two totally different kinds of contractors.

MR. MOULTON: I quite sympathise with the object of the clause, but I am afraid that when a court of law gets hold of the word "machinery," difficulties of interpretation may arise as to what really constitutes "machinery." It is most important that the second part of the clause should be restricted to the case of the opulent person with a large capital vested in agricultural machinery, which he lets out. Will the Government consider whether they cannot introduce some words to qualify the word "machinery"?

MR. LONG: I shall be glad to consider that.

Question put, and agreed to.

*SIR CHARLES WELBY (Nottinghamshire, Newark): I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name. I raised this question upstairs, and the President of the Board of Agriculture appeared to recognise the importance of the point. I have hopes, therefore, that he will accept this Amendment, for I feel sure that its effect will be to do away with some of the criticisms which have been given expression to to-day. The object of the Amendment is to bring within the scope of the Bill a class of cases which are excluded from its operation as it now stands. I feel it is unnecessary that these restrictions should be left in the Bill. They seem to be unwise, and eminently calculated to produce friction and litigation, which everyone recognises should be avoided as far as possible. Under the Bill as it stands a genuine agricultural labourer might meet with an accident, but unless he were engaged upon strictly agricultural work, he would not be entitled to compensation. It is a not uncommon thing for a labourer to be taken off his regular farm work in order to do some special job, for instance to quarry stone to be used in the erection of some church or chapel, or to cart coals for a parish charity. And should he be so engaged at the instance of his employer, he would, if he met with an accident, have no claim to compensation. Now, I think he should be protected in such cases. I will take another illustration in which hardship might arise. The labourer might be directed to drive his master's wife to a neighbouring town. If she was going there in connection with agricultural business, and an accident occurred to the man, he would, of course, come within the scope of the Bill. But if, on the other hand, she was merely going away for a holiday, then the man would have no claim to compensation. I can imagine nothing more certain to lead to misunderstanding and litigation. Having accepted the principle of compensation, the sound method seems to be to define the genuine agricultural labourer, and then to entitle him to compensation in the case of accident, whether the work on which he may be employed at the time of the accident be strictly agricultural or not. I understand, on good authority, that the widening of the scope of the Bill in the way I have suggested will not make any difference to the rate of insurance at which companies are prepared to insure employers. I believe their attitude is one of preference for the widening of the Bill, in order to simplify the matter and to obviate possible litigation. I believe the same argument will appeal to employers. I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"Clause 1, page 1, line 10, after 'Act,' insert 'Where any workman is employed by the same employer mainly in agricultural but partly or occasionally in other work, this Act shall apply also to the employment of the workman in such other work.'—(Sir C. Welby.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. LONG: I hope the House will accept this Amendment. I think it only carries out principles which have already been laid down.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: Can the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that a man shall not be excluded from the benefit of the Act by reason of the fact that the accident occurs off the farm? I believe that under the original Compensation Act it has been decided by the Courts that in the case of a shipbuilders' yard the liability to compensation—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That hardly arises on this Amendment.

Question put and agreed to.

MR. CAWLEY (Lancashire, Prestwich): I have to move an Amendment to render liable, under this Act, all persons who keep horses. I daresay it carries the Act rather further than has been intended. I certainly think that livery stable keepers should be brought within the operation of the Bill. Many of these establishments have no land attached to them, but they consume a good deal of agricultural produce, and I wish to bring these, as well as hunting establishments, under the operation of the Bill.

*MR. LONG: I do not think the Amendment will serve the purpose aimed at. This Bill deals with premises used for the purpose of husbandry, and, obviously, livery stables would not come within that definition.

MR. CAWLEY: But surely husbandry includes the keeping of live stock?

*MR. LONG: It means the use of land for the ordinary purposes of stock or crop raising.

MR. CAWLEY: But the produce consumed in these establishments comes off the farm, and, therefore, I ask, will not people employed in the livery stable come under this Act?

*MR. LONG: Certainly not.

MR. CAWLEY: Well, my Amendment is designed to bring them under the Act, and I therefore beg to move it.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 12, after the word 'land,' to insert the words 'or premises.'—(Mr. Cawley.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or premises' be there inserted."

*MR. LONG: The Amendment will not secure the object aimed at by the hon. Member. This is a Bill which proposes to extend the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act to labourers employed in agriculture. Men engaged in livery stables do not come within that definition, and if we were to concede the point raised by the hon. Member the Bill might at once be made to apply to the whole community, simply because it consumes agricultural produce. These men are not in any sense agricultural employees, and their case therefore cannot be dealt with in a Bill which is solely intended to extend the benefits of a certain Act to agricultural workmen. I hope the hon.

Gentleman will not insist upon his Amendment.

MR. SOAMES (Norfolk, S.): May I ask how this Bill will affect men employed in market gardens which are covered by glass?

*MR. LONG: Market gardeners are engaged in horticulture, and agriculture includes, among other things, horticulture.

MR. CAWLEY: I ask leave of the House to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR CAMERON GULL (Devonshire, Barnstaple): I wish to move the omission of the last three words of Sub-section 2. I do so because they are very vague and might give chances for litigation.

Amendment proposed—

"In Clause 1, page 1, line 14, to leave out 'and the like.'"—(Sir Cameron Gull.)

*MR. LONG: I think my hon. friend is quite right. It is undesirable to retain words which might be capable of a loose construction.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR CAMERON GULL: I have another Amendment of a drafting character, and I believe that earlier in the day the desirability for making it was admitted

Amendment proposed,

"In Clause 1, page 1, leave out from beginning of line 15 to 'agriculture,' in line 16."—(Sir Cameron Gull.)

Amendment agreed to.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): The Amendment which I have to propose has for its object to insure that in the case of an agricultural labourer who meets with an accident in the course of his employment, although he may not be actually engaged on the farm work, he shall not be excluded from the benefits of this Act. It appears to me it is necessary that we should insert a safeguard of this kind; otherwise the compensation provided for under this Bill will be of a very limited character. I am told that my Amendment as it stands on the Paper is rather too wide, and I propose it, therefore, in a rather different form.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 16, after the word 'agriculture,' to insert the words—'A workman employed in agriculture shall not be excluded from this Act by reason only that the accident arose outside the farm or premises of his employer in the course of his work.'"—(Captain Sinclair.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. LONG: This Amendment extends the Bill to all kinds of accidents which may befall all kinds of agricultural labour. I would point out that it is not really necessary. In the original Act the liability is closely connected with the premises on which the industry is conducted. But in this Bill there is no connection between the accident and the place of employment. All that is necessary is that the employer shall be an employer in agriculture, and that the man shall be a servant also employed in agriculture. Wherever, therefore, the accident takes place the man will come within the purview of the Bill so long as the conditions I have named obtain. There is, therefore, no necessity for the addition of these words.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: After the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

*MR. GOULDING: I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name. In a recent decision in the High Court it has been laid down that a man who has not been in continuous employment for fourteen days is outside the scope of the parent Act. Now, it certainly was never contemplated by Parliament that such a rule should be laid down, and I have drafted an Amendment the adoption of which will ensure that a similar injustice is not created under this Bill. The men affected are very often the poorest, and are therefore the most deserving of protection, and I cannot possibly understand how it can be held that men who are in a certain employment for four, five, or six days shall not be entitled to the same protection as is granted to other men who are fortunate in being longer employed. I understand that no difficulty would arise with the insurance companies through the adoption of this Amendment. They do not require the names of the employees; they only ask that they shall be supplied with the total number of men employed and the amount of their wages, and they are quite willing to take the risk, for they are assured that no master would allow any man to apply for compensation unless he was entitled to it. I hope that the Government, who have already done so much for social reform, will accept this Amendment.

Amendment proposed —

"In page 1, line 16, after the word 'agriculture,' to insert the words, 'The expression "average weekly earnings," in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, shall, for the purpose of this Act, be deemed to mean six times the workman's average daily wage during his employment with the employer in whose service he shall sustain personal injury by accident, although he may not have been so employed for a period of two weeks prior thereto.'—
(Mr. Goulding.)

MR. LONG: I regret extremely that my hon. friend has thought it necessary to move this Amendment. It is obvious that any proposal on our part to accept it would lead to prolonged discussion. It may or may not be desirable to include what is called "casual labour" within the purview of the Bill. But if it be desirable in the case of agriculture, it is still more so in other industries where such labour is employed to a far greater extent. Personally, I should be disposed to offer strong resistance to the acceptance of this Amendment dealing with the matter in this limited form. But it is impossible now to enter upon the merits of the proposal, and as I am very desirous that the Bill should pass through the Report stage this afternoon, I appeal to my hon. friend to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Durham, Mid): I would like to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that this Amendment does not relate solely to casual labour, meaning men employed a day or two. It affects men permanently employed. It has been decided in the Appeal Court that where a miner is engaged in Lancashire at 6s. a day, on the second day of his employment he is not a casual labourer. I believe the framers of the Act of 1897 intended that, however short a time a man may work for his employer, he should benefit by the Act. It was not intended that he should first work a complete fortnight, although it has been laid down in one case that an average weekly wage cannot be fixed unless the man has worked a full fortnight. I hope this matter will be pressed to a division.

MR. H. S. FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I rise to make an appeal to my hon. friend to withdraw this Amendment. I hope he will not allow it to be said that he, as one of the promoters of the measure, talked it out. We have had some very valuable concessions from the Government, and I would point out to my hon. friend that he will have an opportunity of again raising his question, if he wishes, by moving to re-commit the Bill on the motion for its Third Reading.

MR. GOULDING: I ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Title amended.

Bill to be read the third time on Wednesday next, and to be printed.
[Bill 257.]

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS TO CHILDREN (No. 2) BILL.

(In the Committee)

[MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) in the Chair.]

Clause 1:—

MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I have an Amendment to move to this Bill. It will be remembered that when, through some misunderstanding, it obtained its Second Reading, I intimated that it would be necessary to introduce some very important Amendments, and this is the first of them. [Opposition cries of "Agreed!"] Hon. Members opposite may cry "Agreed," but I am not sure that Members on this side of the House are agreed, and it is their opinion which I wish to obtain. I believe the adoption of the Amendments which I have drawn will make the measure harmless and even desirable——

It being half-past Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday next.

CRUELTY TO WILD ANIMALS IN CAPTIVITY BILL.

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the third time and passed.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (LOCAL VETO) (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

DISTRICT COUNCILLORS AND GUARDIANS (TERM OF OFFICE) BILL.

Read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Seventh Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN MOVEMENT—CAPTURE OF THE TA-KU FORTS, ETC.

On the Motion for Adjournment:—

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I wish to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he can give us any news from China.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I am afraid we have very little news. There is one telegram to the Admiralty, a portion of which is already in possession of the House. It is from Rear-Admiral Bruce, at Ta-ku, via Chifu, dated 20th June:—

"17th June.

"Ta-ku forts captured by allied forces this morning. Bombardment commenced 12.50 a.m.; ended about 6.30 a.m. Details later on. Chinese admiral present with allied fleet. Flag flying in cruiser. At council meeting this morning he agreed to anchor with fleet, putting out fires.

"18th June.

"No news from Commander-in-Chief and advanced guard. Tientsin now cut off; heavy fire heard there last night; 3,000 Russian troops under major-general here. My communications with allied authorities most harmonious."

With regard to the heavy firing at Tientsin, a telegram has been received at the Foreign Office from the British Consul at Tientsin, via Chifu. It is dated 20th June, but it may perhaps have left Tientsin on the 18th. It is to this effect:—

"Boxers last night did much damage to line north of Tientsin and burned Roman Catholic cathedral, mission chapel, and great number of Chinese houses. Chinese troops made no visible effort to restrain them. On their attacking settlement foreign guard killed about 100."

Adjourned at twenty minutes before Six of the clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

VOLUNTEERS BILL [H.L.].

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 :—

LORD MONKSWELL : My Lords, I was under the impression that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War did not intend taking the Committee stage of this Bill until Friday, and therefore I have not put down the Amendment which it was my intention to move. I will, however, move it in the Standing Committee. The effect of my Amendment will be to leave out Sub-section (b) of Clause 2, and, of course, to consequentially amend the former part of the section. The noble Marquess explained to the House on a former occasion that he considered it desirable that Volunteers should be called out for active service within the limits of the United Kingdom. I do not object to that, but, for the reasons I gave on a recent occasion, I think it very undesirable that Volunteers should be called upon to give an undertaking to serve outside the United Kingdom before circumstances arise which justify a special call for their services.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE) :

I understand that the noble Lord does not intend to press his Amendment on this occasion, and therefore I scarcely feel justified in taking up your Lordships' time in commenting upon it. In our view it is desirable that we should place it within the power of Volunteers to assume, if they so desire, a liability for service beyond the limits of the United Kingdom. They have done so lately with great distinction to themselves, and in our view it is not likely that they will consent to deprive themselves of the power of rendering similar services should the opportunity hereafter arise. If that be so, it is clearly our opinion that we should be put in a position to make the necessary arrangements with such Volunteers not at the last moment and in a hurried fashion, but deliberately and beforehand. That is the reason we have inserted this provision in the Bill, and I confess I should be very sorry indeed if your Lordships decided to get rid of it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I adhere to the opinion I have already expressed, and I should have preferred to see both (a) and (b) omitted from the clause. I object to them on general grounds—as altering the character of the Volunteer force, as likely to give rise to embarrassment hereafter, and as totally unnecessary, in my opinion, for the purpose which the noble Marquess has in view.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Other clauses agreed to ; Bill reported without amendment ; and recommitted to the Standing Committee.

MILITARY LANDS BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 :—

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE : The clause as it now stands would render it impossible to set in motion the machinery of the clause on behalf of a rifle club. It is felt that this restriction would be undesirable, and my Amendment removes it.

Moved—

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: This clause, as at present worded, obliges a Volunteer corps, as well as a county council or any other local authority, to apply to the Local Government Board for leave to borrow. That is a very proper condition in the case of a local authority, but I do not think that it should apply in the case of a Volunteer corps. Under the Military Lands Act of 1892 Volunteer corps must apply to the War Office for permission to borrow, and in our opinion the War Office would be a better judge in cases of that kind than the Local Government Board.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 1, page 1, line 9, to leave out from 'and' to 'may' in line 11, and to insert 'for this purpose.'"—(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Consequential Amendments agreed to.

Clause 1, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 :—

LORD MONKSWELL: To this clause I have to move a drafting Amendment of very considerable importance. It is not my own, but Lord Thring's. Lord Thring would have moved it himself had he been able to be present to-day. On looking through Clause 3, Lord Thring was quite unable to satisfy himself of the effect of the clause as it at present stands. Your Lordships will see that it is a case of legislation by reference run mad. In the first place, certain provisions of Section 9 of the Local Government Act, 1894, are to apply; but they are to apply with certain modifications. Those modifications refer to other Acts, and if those Acts are looked at it will be found that they in their turn refer to previous Acts. The consequence is that anyone who reads this section will have considerable difficulty in understanding what the procedure is. Lord Thring suggests that it is exceedingly desirable that Her Majesty's Government should lay down in the schedule the rules of procedure which they consider are applicable to this case. They will have no difficulty in doing so if they understand Clause 3, which Lord Thring is unable to do. I would suggest that before the next stage of the Bill, or in the Standing Committee, the noble Marquess should produce a schedule describing in detail the procedure he proposes.

Moved—

"In Clause 3, page 2, line 4, after 'purposes' to leave out to the end of the clause and insert 'the regulations contained in the Schedule hereto as to the confirmation and otherwise of the resolution mentioned in this section shall apply in the same manner as if they were re-enacted in the Act.'"—(Lord Monkswell.)

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: No one has more respect for the high authority cited by the noble Lord than I have, and it is quite true that we all occasionally complain of the abuse of what is generally described as legislation by reference. I am afraid the offence, if it be one, is committed rather indiscriminately by all of us, and for very obvious reasons. The noble Lord has moved to insert the words—

"The regulations contained in the Schedule hereto as to the confirmation and otherwise of the resolution mentioned in this section shall apply in the same manner as if they were re-enacted in the Act."

But he has left it to us to provide the necessary schedule. I have made some inquiries as to the probable character of that schedule, and I am told that it would be one of considerable length, covering four or five pages of printed matter. That would greatly add to the bulk of the Statute-book, and I submit that in this case it is scarcely necessary. I am told that the procedure to be followed under these two Acts—the Local Government Act, 1894, and the Allotments Acts, 1887—is very well understood, and that an exhaustive recapitulation of all the clauses would be superfluous. I have an Amendment to the same clause which will perhaps deprive it of some of the ambiguity to which the noble Lord has referred, and I certainly prefer my Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): The noble Lord is setting a very bad precedent. In order to render the Amendment intelligible, anyone voting on it must have the schedule before him; but we are asked to vote on the Amendment without in the least knowing what the schedule is to be. I hope the Amendment will not be adopted.

LORD MONKSWELL: My proposition is that at the next stage of the Bill the schedule should be set out, and the House given an opportunity of considering its provisions. Surely the four or five pages of printed matter to which the noble Marquess has referred might be lessened by some modified and perfectly intelligible reference to statutes that are easily accessible. But if it is the case that the Government cannot make the meaning of the clause clear to the ordinary mind under four or five pages, then that is an additional reason why those pages should be set out. I may mention that Lord Thring placed this Bill before the Parliamentary Committee of the County Councils Association yesterday, and that the committee passed a resolution recommending that the procedure clauses should be set out in full in the schedule.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I agree strongly with the Amendment of my noble friend. This is the most outrageous case I have heard of. It is most extraordinary that a Bill of this kind, involving very considerable dealings with land, should be passed through Parliament without the procedure being clearly set out. And why, forsooth, is this to be done? Because it is so complicated that it will take the War Office a long time to make it clear. Now, I ask, is the ordinary reader to understand it without the assistance of those gentlemen in the War Office who, whatever may be their qualifications on military matters, are perfectly able to prepare a schedule of this kind? I hope the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, who has frequently spoken against the practice of legislating by-reference, will persuade his colleagues to give the public some assistance in understanding this Bill.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: May I ask whether it is likely to add to the value of the precedent you are endeavouring to set up, to enact that there shall be a schedule of some sort or other without describing it?

LORD MONKSWELL: I suggest that the noble Marquess should withdraw these words from the clause with a view of producing a schedule at some future time.

On Question, their Lordships proceeded to a division.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I am very anxious not to keep back from persons interested in this Bill any information with regard to the manner in which it will operate, and I suggest, as a possible solution of the difficulty, that we might print and lay upon the Table of the House—

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am afraid the noble Marquess is out of order in speaking now.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): The noble Earl is quite right. There can be no speaking after a division has been called.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): All we have to do is to withdraw the division and proceed.

On the Question being again put, the Amendment was negatived.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There is now no reason why the noble Earl should not allow my noble friend to make his statement.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: We refrained from dividing in order to enable him to have an opportunity of making it.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: The suggestion I was going to throw out was that we might make the position perfectly clear, without encumbering the Statute-book with a schedule of inordinate length, if the clauses of the two Acts which affect the clause in this Bill were printed and laid upon the Table of the House for your Lordships' consideration. It would then be for your Lordships to judge whether it was necessary to do anything more or not.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I think that suggestion perfectly reasonable.

Drafting Amendments agreed to.

Clause 3, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 4, 5, and 6 agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: The new clause standing in my name after Clause 6 has been introduced at the instance of my noble friend Lord Balfour of Burleigh, and is designed to render the Act applicable to Scotland. I must take it from him that the Amendment is sufficient for the purpose. I cannot pretend to be sufficiently conversant with the mysteries of Scottish law to affirm that it is so from my own knowledge.

Moved—

"To insert as a new clause, after Clause 6:—(1.) In the application of this Act to Scotland the following provision shall have effect—(a) The expressions "council of any urban district" and "council of any urban district other than a borough" shall mean the commissioners of a police burgh; (b) the expression "Public Health Acts" shall mean the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, provided that the limit of rate imposed by that Act shall not apply to any rate authorised by this Act; (c) the expression "hire" shall mean "take on lease"; (d) references to the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, and to Section 25 and Sub-sections (2) to (4) and (7) to (9) of Section 26 thereof shall be substituted for references to the Local Government Act, 1894, and to Section 9 and Sub-sections (2) to (5) and (8) to (10) thereof respectively; (e) a reference to Sub-section (8) of Section 25 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, shall be substituted for a reference to Sub-sections (1) and (5) of the Local Government Act, 1888; (f) in Section 6 of this Act the expression "Local Government Board" shall mean the Local Government Board for Scotland. (2.) In Sub-section (9) of Section 25 of the Military Lands Act, 1892, "twenty-one" shall be substituted for "twenty-two."—(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

On Question, new Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to; Bill recommitted to the Standing Committee; and to be reprinted as amended. (No. 117.)

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, this is a Bill to increase the sum provided for the construction of the Uganda railway, the expense of the work having exceeded the estimates which we made for it. But this is so common a failure with respect to the prophecies of surveyors, architects, and engineers that it has almost come to be regarded as a matter of right that their estimates should in some degree fall short of their ultimate expenditure. I am not, however, going to plead any right of that kind in the present instance, though I hold that the universal practice for many generations has established the fact that surveyors and engineers may exceed the estimates they have laid down. There is no need for me to appeal to that unhappy experience. The first Bill was passed under very peculiar circumstances. It was deliberately passed by Parliament without there being that survey which is invariably undertaken before any railway is begun. There was a survey executed under circumstances of great difficulty, and with great ability, by Major Macdonald, but it was not a survey such as is generally made in such a case. Most of the ground was not even travelled over, and some of the circumstances necessary to be known in carrying through the work were not even ascertained. But Parliament were perfectly well aware of what it was doing. They perfectly well knew that it was a railway undertaken without such a survey as is usually carried through before a work of such magnitude, or, indeed, any railway work at all, is undertaken. For instance, the character of the labour market, the opportunities that there were for obtaining the requisite number of workmen, the cost at which they could be obtained, the nature of the soil with reference both to its operation upon steel sleepers and its action under the pressure of tropical rains and hurricanes, and many other matters, which a more elaborate survey would have cleared up, were left without being fully or even considerably investigated. Anyone who reads the report of Sir Guilford Molesworth will see that this statement is fully borne out by him. Then it may be asked why we undertook a railway without a preliminary survey. My answer is that we did so with a perfect consciousness of what we were doing, and for the sake of speed. There is no doubt that if we had gone through the usual process many more years would have passed before there was any chance of completing the work; and anybody who remembers the political condition of the country at that time will not find it difficult to realise that there were considerations of a very cogent character which induced us to desire to finish, at the earliest period possible, what was practically our only access to these regions. At that time the battle of Omdurman had not been fought, the occupation of Fashoda had not taken place, the very wide-reaching agreements which we have since made with the French Government had not then been discussed, and our position was one which I will not say was critical, but our position was one of very considerable difficulty if any serious embarrassments with any European Power had arisen before we had done anything to make our military access to the place easier than it naturally was. I doubt whether anyone will challenge the soundness of that reasoning, and I will not pursue it, because it leads into many matters which are not precisely suitable for discussion. If the railway was to be made, one of the great objects why it should be made was to give us military access to the country; and therefore it was important that it should be made with as much speed as possible. On these grounds we undoubtedly entered on the railway without that complete and exhaustive survey which under other circumstances would have been proper and suitable; but I do not think that any great harm was done. There is no doubt that the sanguine views which were entertained have not been carried out, but many things have happened which we had no reason to anticipate. The native labour market to a very great extent proved useless, and we were compelled to go to the Indian labour market, which was itself enormously embarrassed by the famine and pestilence with which that country has been visited. The use of cattle in the country was very seriously impeded by the outbreak of rinderpest, which raged with such fury over all those territories. One of the first necessities in constructing a railway is to have an adequate supply of machinery, and when that necessity was pressing upon us the most strongly there came the engineers' strike in England, which arrested the supply of machinery for a considerable time. There were many other difficulties which it may be said we might have foreseen, but which we could not have altogether foreseen, and which had the effect of considerably raising the price. I observe that in another place a railway was cited for our example—namely, the Beira Railway—which had been completed at a somewhat cheaper rate; but the citation was an unfortunate one, for the Beira Railway has turned out so supremely ill-made that it has had to be almost entirely recast, and I doubt very much whether in the end it will be found to have been constructed at a cheaper rate than we propose to assign to the Uganda Railway. Although there is good ground for the speed at which we constructed the railway and the comparative absence of precaution, there has been no financial disaster. The railway is now advancing rapidly, and as soon as the great work of the Mau escarpment has been overcome—it requires engineering arrangements of a peculiar character, but the difficulties, I believe, are now very nearly overcome—the line will reach the lake with great rapidity; whether in the course of next year or not I do not know. The expert evidence seems to show that that will probably be the case; but, at all events, we are very near the end, and I am sure that when the railway is completed it will be an enormous engine for the civilisation of the country. On these grounds, my Lords, I hope there will be no objection on the part of this House to give its assent to the measure which the House of Commons has passed, by which the amount assigned shall be raised from three millions to nearly five millions.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, no doubt at first sight the amount demanded by this Bill appears extremely startling. It is very rare that an estimate is exceeded to so large an extent, and, on the face of it, it appears to be a very serious matter. I agree, however, with the noble Marquess that it was highly desirable, as we were in possession of Uganda—a question which is now beyond discussion altogether—that without loss of time railway communication with the coast should be established, and that there were many reasons—some of which it is not desirable to enter into—which made it extremely unsafe that we should have no means of communicating with that distant possession. I think that it was not without justification that this project was set on foot without that detailed survey which undoubtedly would have been made under other circumstances. What I would like to know is whether the Government are of opinion that they are now in possession of such complete information that they can with confidence say that the present estimate is not likely to be exceeded. I gathered, from reading some time ago that very able Report to which the noble Marquess referred, that there had been a very large change in the whole direction of the railway towards the Lake, and that that had involved a great increase in the cost. I suppose those who projected the railway and framed the estimates hardly took into consideration the presence of a considerable number of lions, who ate up a number of the coolies employed. Looking at the cost of the railways in India during the time I was connected with the administration of that country, and considering the difficulties of the country through which this line had to pass, I do not think that the amount is very excessive. In ordinary circumstances I would be inclined to say that it was, of course, a scandalous thing to ask Parliament for a sum of three millions and then to add two millions, or nearly two millions, to that figure. But, as I have already remarked, this case must be judged in a different way, and only those who are well aware of the very peculiar conditions under which we held the country can rightly estimate the matter, and I will not say the excuses but the reasons why it cannot be regarded as a subject for censure. All I wish to do, therefore, is to ask whether the Government are now in possession of satisfactory information enabling them to say that the sum at present fixed will be sufficient.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am afraid I can only tell the noble Earl that I am told so. I cannot pledge my own knowledge of engineering as a ground for believing that it will be so, but those with whom I have been in communication are quite of opinion that the sum named will cover the expense. Of course, the unknown plays a considerable part in this matter. It is the part of the railway which is furthest from the coast that is less known, and there may be embarrassments and difficulties which we cannot foresee. But, speaking my own conviction, I have little doubt that what we are now asking for will be enough. With respect to the lions, I feel bound to say something in their behalf. They are not so aristocratic that they will only feed on coolies; they took a medical man the other day, and I expect it will be found that they have taken many other people. The noble Earl indicated that in consequence of our not having had a survey we were compelled to take a longer route than we otherwise would have done. That is not so.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I did not mean to imply that. I do not know that the answer of the noble Marquess exactly gives me the information for which I asked. What I wished to know was not so much whether the noble Marquess himself was of opinion that the estimate was sufficient, as whether there had been such an examination of the country, especially the difficult new country which has to be passed through, as would make the estimate formed probably a correct one.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I do not think I would be doing right if I pledged myself. Undoubtedly, the part of the country referred to has been very little investigated yet; but, according to the opinion of competent persons, the estimate ought to be sufficient.

On Question agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow, and Standing Order No. XXXIX. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with.

THE CROMWELL STATUE.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE: My Lords, I rise to call attention to the erection of a statue of Oliver Cromwell within the precincts of the Palace of Westminster without the consent of Parliament; and to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to a speech of the First Commissioner of Works in the House of Commons, on 23rd February,† in which he laid down as a doctrine of Constitutional Law, that in the case of the erection of a statue upon which no public money is spent, the First Commissioner of Works is under no obligation to consult Parliament as to the acceptance of the gift or as to a site; and, if so, does the doctrine hold good even when the opinion of Parliament has been expressed against the proposed statue or site. I hope your Lordships will forgive me for bringing to your notice a matter which I know is considered by many people to be past and done with. But there are circumstances resulting from it which, in my opinion, are very far from being past and done with. Your Lordships will observe that I have prefaced my question by asking to be allowed to call attention to the erection of a statue of Oliver Cromwell within the precincts of the Palace of Westminster without the consent of Parliament. I have done so for the following reasons:—First, it is only the facts in connection with this statue which render intelligible the point on which I am going to ask the Prime Minister for enlightenment; and second, I am anxious to take this opportunity of explaining why I have not followed up the Motion I carried in your Lordships' House in October last by a further Motion. I am aware that the effect of the division I took on that occasion was discounted by the press and only too plainly by Her Majesty's Government, and, perhaps, with your Lordships' permission, while I am referring to this point I may be allowed to allude to what may be considered a personal matter. I have a painful recollection that on the occasion referred to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack characterised the Motion I brought forward as not calculated to add to the dignity of your Lordships' House; but I hope your Lordships will believe that it was very far from my intention to do anything disrespectful. The circumstances were peculiar. It was only when the pedestal on which the Cromwell statue now stands reared itself into view that any one realised the intention of Her Majesty's Government, and petitions came in from all parts of the country. I have a list in my hand of 274 petitions which, I believe, have been presented to Her Majesty's Government protesting against the erection of this statue. The only opportunity I had of protesting was by putting down a motion. Parliament was about to adjourn, and I put down my motion with the sole object of getting Her Majesty's Government to consent to defer the putting up of the statue until the re-assembling of Parliament in the coming year, when both Houses of Parliament would have an opportunity of expressing their feelings and their opinion on the matter. Her Majesty's Government decided to ignore the division that was taken in this House, and on a dark November morning the statue of the great Protector was stealthily unveiled by a workman representing, I presume, the First Commissioner of Works, and without one word of panegyric. It is true that on the same evening a demonstration was held to celebrate this unique and interesting ceremony. I am informed that the anonymous donor of the statue addressed the meeting, but, of course, I have no authority to say so. I eagerly scanned the names of those present on the platform in the expectation of finding the name of the First Commissioner of Works, if not that of the Prime Minister himself. It is strange that not one single member of Her Majesty's Government was present, and I think it is a significant fact that of the party that supports Her Majesty's Government the names of only two members were on the list—one a Unionist Peer, and the other a Conservative Member of the House of Commons who himself had signed a petition protesting against the erection of this statue without the previous consent of Parliament. I fully intended to have drawn your Lordships' attention to this singular proceeding before, but at the time I thought of doing so the very serious aspect of affairs in South Africa led me to think that it would not be convenient to raise the question. Unfortunately, Mr. Swift MacNeill did not share that opinion, and he brought the matter forward in the House of Commons by moving an Amendment on the Vote for the maintenance of the Royal Palaces.* I regret very much that episode, but I think it is worthy of note that the matter was brought forward wholly unexpectedly, with the result that Her Majesty's Government got a very large majority, but in the minority were many Members of the House of Commons who usually support the Government. Thereupon I put down the question on the Paper, which I should have asked the Prime Minister some weeks ago had I not unfortunately been laid up, and unable to attend your Lordships' House. On the occasion of the debate referred to, the First Commissioner of Works stated that it had never been the practice of his Department, when a statue was paid for by public or private subscription and not out of public funds, to consult Parliament. That claim, my Lords, does not square with the statement made by the noble Lord, Lord Churchill, who represented Her Majesty's Government when I brought my motion before the House in October last. Lord Churchill said :—

"The understanding on which the work [the statue] was to be executed was that a suitable site, satisfactory to the donor and to Parliament, should be given by the Government."

I was astonished at that statement, and I asked the noble Lord why Her Majesty's Government, in face of that understanding, did not think it necessary to consult Parliament, and the noble Lord replied that the terms were arranged by the late First Commissioner of Works and not by Mr. Akers-Douglas. The fact that Mr. Herbert Gladstone arranged and Mr. Akers-Douglas accepted those terms distinctly negatives his claim that the First Commissioner can deal with all such matters proprio motu without consulting Parliament. The claim of the First Commissioner of Works, reduced to its logical conclusion, amounts to this—that the First Commissioner of Works has the right to give a site and erect a statue in any of the Royal palaces, without consulting Parliament, to any obscure or undeserving person which some generous person might be willing to give. Suppose some enthusiastic pro-Boer offered a statue of Mr. Kruger—the First Commissioner of Works, according to this doctrine, is perfectly entitled to give a site, and your Lordships would not be allowed to say a word. Suppose that somebody presented a statue of Guy Fawkes—in the same way Parliament would have no voice in the matter. There is one further point upon which I desire the opinion of the Prime Minister. Assuming that it is no part of the duties of the First Commissioner of Works to consult Parliament in these matters, but that, as a fact, Parliament has expressed an opinion, is the First Commissioner of Works entitled to disregard that opinion, for that is exactly what the First Commissioner has done in this case? On June 17th, 1895, the House of Commons decided, by a majority of 137, that they would not erect a statue to Oliver Cromwell.* This was during Lord Rosebery's Administration. It is true that, technically speaking, the decision of the House was against a reduction of £500, but the tenor of the debate, and, more especially, the tenor of the speech of Mr. Balfour, who led the Opposition, shows conclusively that the House voted against any statue at all to Oliver Cromwell; and I cannot believe that anyone who has read or who heard that debate can seriously attempt to put aside the decision of the House on the plea of so trumpery a technicality. Four days after the 17th of June, Lord Rosebery's Government fell. During those four days the anonymous donor came forward and offered to Lord Rosebery, as head of the Government, a statue which Lord Rosebery, as head of the Government, accepted. He did that in the teeth of the division in the House of Commons against a statue of Cromwell, and it seems to me that this action was a cynical defiance of the wishes of Parliament without parallel, probably, since the days of Cromwell himself. I hope I have not detained your Lordships too long, but I feel strongly on this subject. I believe that the question which I now put to the Prime Minister is one involving a constitutional point of considerable importance. If the noble Marquess holds that the doctrine which the First Commissioner of Works has laid down is correct, that the First Commissioner is legally clothed with this almost papal authority, then, I submit, the sooner his powers are reduced to the level of those of other members of the Government the better for the appearance of the Palace of Westminster and the dignity of our monarchical Constitution.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, my noble friend has led us so deep into the mysteries of constitutional law that I feel considerable misgiving in addressing myself to a matter which really ought to be dealt with by the legal Members of the House. But if I may be allowed to confine myself to answering the question put to me, I will try to do it to the best of my ability. I am asked whether my attention has been called to a speech of the First Commissioner of

Works, in which he laid down, as a doctrine of constitutional law, that in the case of the erection of a statue upon which no public money is spent the First Commissioner of Works is under no obligation to consult Parliament as to the acceptance of the gift or the character of the site. Well, my Lords, suppose the converse were laid down, that the First Commissioner of Works must consult Parliament as to every statue which is to be erected throughout the country upon any site over which he has control. I think that is a proposition which will not be found in any of those works on Constitutional law to which I have no doubt my noble friend has referred himself. When I was taught constitutional law, I imagined that the relations of the Executive to Parliament were to be these—not that the Executive had to come to Parliament for leave to act under its executive powers, but that, when the Executive Government had acted in the discharge of its executive powers and had in the view of Parliament committed an error in so doing, the remedy of Parliament was to censure the Minister and to turn him and his colleagues out of office. I believe that to be the sound constitutional doctrine, and I think that the already over-burdened House of Commons would be still more terribly burdened if everything a Minister proposed to do in his executive capacity was subject to debate by Parliament before he exercised his power. I do not think Oliver Cromwell himself would have had any hesitation on this point, and I think even less violent politicians than Cromwell would have protested very strongly against the idea that the powers of the Executive Government are to be exercised by Parliament. Those powers are to be exercised subject to the judgment of and exposed to the review of Parliament. Turning from these grave matters to the smaller details, I will proceed to the next part of the question. I am asked, does this doctrine hold good even when the opinion of Parliament has been expressed against the proposed statue or site? The opinion of Parliament was not expressed against the proposed statue; it was expressed in support of the much more commonplace view, that Parliament declined to vote the money—an attitude which Parliament very frequently takes up, and an attitude which is obviously within its most primary and elementary constitutional powers. My noble friend talks of this as, I think, a piece of trumpery pettifoggery. The Vote was refused by a large majority, and therefore my noble friend says Parliament has pledged itself to the doctrine that the statue is not to be erected, even though no public money is required. There, again, I think my noble friend will find it very difficult to summon to the support of that doctrine those lights of learning of which this House is proud. The matter for us is very simple. It is not so much as a matter of constitutional law that the matter appeals to me; what appeals more to my sympathy is the doctrine of continuity of policy. The late First Commissioner of Works undertook to give a site and to accept a statue, and on the faith of that undertaking certain monies were expended by a private individual whose name we shall never know. It seems to me not a matter of constitutional law but of common honesty that when the First Commissioner of Works was changed, his successor should hold himself bound by the promise which his predecessor had given, and should not take advantage of the change, especially when money had been expended by the person to whom the promise was given. It would be impossible to conduct business with the vast number of persons who have to consent to contracts with Her Majesty's Government on matters of very much more importance than this, if the doctrine was once laid down that a change of Government released the incoming Government from all that the former Government had promised. I do not think you can possibly accept such a doctrine as that. I understand that there are three questions at issue. First, ought the money of Parliament to be spent on the matter at all? Secondly, if not, ought Oliver Cromwell to have had a statue at all? And, thirdly, if he ought to have had a statue, ought it to have been placed in the sunken garden to which it has now been banished? I am no adorer of Oliver Cromwell, but if I wished to hand down an unfavourable view of his policy and history I could devise no more outward and visible sign of it than to put him at the bottom of a hole. So long as the anonymous donor, whose political opinions I cannot even guess, is content with that way of honouring the particular hero whom he delights to praise, I do not see that those who belong to what I may call the side of the question to which my noble friend and I belong—to the party which is not supposed to be enthusiastically or extravagantly desirous of honouring Oliver Cromwell—need complain of the arrangement, because I do not see how any arrangement could be devised which would suit our views so satisfactorily. Having a statue, they can hardly have another. No one can lift him out of the depths to which he has been relegated, and I think foreigners will go away from the site, after studying the Statesmen whom we have honoured in the surrounding land, with the observation, “Behold the banishment that a just monarchical Government inflicts upon a rebel and a regicide!”

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: I would remind the House that the division against the site was taken on the morning of the prorogation, in a very thin House composed of ten Peers, and was only carried by a majority of two. No discourtesy to the noble Lord was intended by me when I pointed out that a division taken in such circumstances was not calculated to add to the dignity of this House or to the respect with which people would regard its decisions.

LORD MORRIS: My Lords, I had hoped that some Peer of more importance than I can pretend to be would have intervened in this discussion. The noble Earl who opened it I think satisfied the House that a transaction had taken place that ought not to have taken place. That is the point. I quite agree, if I may take the liberty of saying so, with the noble Marquess that it is not a proper description of the matter to say it is unconstitutional. That is entirely too vague and too large a phrase to describe what occurred; but I do say, and I think everybody who has heard the temperate, concise, and effective statement of the noble Earl will have come to the conclusion, that what occurred ought not to have taken place. I cannot understand how any First Commissioner of Works can find it consistent with his duty to arrogate to himself the right to set up a statue within the precincts of the Palace of Westminster if he knew that the presence of that statue would be objectionable to the great majority of the Members of both Houses of Parliament. If the First Commissioner had such a right why was the statue unveiled in a surreptitious manner on a November night, and why was it accepted from an anonymous donor? I think it is an indignity to both Houses to accept such a statue in such a manner. Is the donor ashamed of his action? Is that the reason he wishes to preserve his anonymity? It is childish to continue to talk of the donor being anonymous when everyone knows in this House and in the street—a favourite place now to appeal to—who the anonymous donor is. He was the Prime Minister of the Crown, and his First Commissioner of Works accepted his statue. What made him so urgent? Was it because Oliver Cromwell disposed in a summary way of the House of Lords, or was it because he was enabled to quote Oliver Cromwell as a great instance to save him from that unpleasant thing, the Nonconformist conscience which objects to racing? The noble Earl—I decline to speak of him as the anonymous donor, for in the Courts of Justice we are in the habit of calling a spade a spade—with reference to the objection of Irish representatives, said that they should not object to a statue in London when Englishmen did not object to statues in Dublin. To this I reply that I would not raise any protest against a statue of Cromwell in the streets of London provided I was not expected to subscribe to it, but it is quite a different matter to erect such a statue within the precincts of the Houses of Parliament, in which Irishmen have an interest in common with representatives of other parts of the kingdom. The point is not that a statue of Oliver Cromwell was to be put up, but that it was put up within the precincts of the Palace of Westminster upon the promise of the First Commissioner of Works, who knew at that very time it was contrary to the wish of both Houses of Parliament. I do not think that point has been met. It is not a question of its being unconstitutional; it is a question of a thing having been done which ought not to have been done, and which was done to a certain extent defiantly. The doctrine of continuity of policy which has been referred to is seldom carried out in things that are right. If Mr. Herbert Gladstone did wrong, why was Mr. Akers-Douglas to persevere in that wrong, particularly when he could shield himself under not only the fact that this House did not approve of it, but that the House of Commons substantially disapproved of it? Anybody who reads the debate will see that the £500 was a mere bagatelle. The question discussed was, was Oliver Cromwell a person to whom a statue should be erected within the precincts of the House of Commons? Continuity of policy did not justify the First Commissioner of Works in carrying out the mistaken intention of his predecessor to erect a statue to the man who ended, not mended, the House of Lords, and ignominiously drove the Members of the House of Commons from their place of meeting. If the noble Earl who raised this question had concluded with a motion, I think he would have received considerable support in this House. I would certainly have voted for his motion.

The Marquess of Salisbury.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I do not think that anyone in this House would desire to go into a discussion as to the merits of Oliver Cromwell; no doubt there are great differences of opinion as to that great historical character. A very considerable time has elapsed since the events in which Cromwell too part occurred, and, for my part, I consider that he was one of the greatest men this country ever produced, and any honour done to him is an honour to the country to which he belonged. Further than that I will not go, nor will I say anything as to the attack made by the opponents of Cromwell. The anonymous donor is a donor whom, undoubtedly, we all know, and that being the case I feel myself justified in saying that I think the anonymous donor, even if he be a member of this House, has done nothing whatever of which he has any reason to be ashamed, but on the contrary I think that everyone who has any respect for the great men of the country ought to be obliged to him for what he has presented to the nation. The only other observation I wish to make is as to the speech of the noble Lord who has just sat down. He seems to have entirely forgotten that there is a bust of Oliver Cromwell at this moment placed on a very conspicuous site within the very walls and precincts of the House of Commons, and that it was placed there since the present Government came into office. If it became a question for discussion, which is the more offensive to the opponents of Oliver Cromwell—the statue in what the noble Marquess called a “hole” outside, or the bust in a central position where it must come under the notice of every Member of the House of Commons? Upon the whole, I think that discussions of this kind about one of our greatest men do no honour to the House, and will not meet with the approbation of right thinking men in the country.

*THE EARL OF HARDWICKE: I am very grateful to the Prime Minister for the full way in which he has dealt with my question. I disagree with the noble Marquess when he says that the statue is in a hole. Though he is technically correct, it must be borne in mind that it is on a pedestal which makes it one of the most conspicuous statues in London. As to the bust in the House of Commons, to which Lord Kimberley referred, it is a question of degree. The bust inside the House is small and not conspicuous. The statue outside is conspicuously before the public; everyone can see it and everyone who sees it knows that it was placed there by a Conservative Government and will infer that it was placed there to do honour to the memory of one who no doubt was a great man. I regret, after the very strong feeling which I observe exists in your Lordships' House on this question, that I did not move a motion instead of asking a question.

G.P.O.—TRANSFER TO MOUNT PLEASANT—POSTAL REARRANGEMENTS, DELAYS, ETC.

EARL STANHOPE: My Lords, I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain under what circumstances and in what cases the hours of posting for the provincial mails have been curtailed, in consequence of the transfer of a portion of the work of the General Post Office to Mount Pleasant. It will be within your Lordships' knowledge that certain complaints have arisen owing to the curtailment of the hours to which I have referred. This alteration is a source of great inconvenience in the West End and in the City, and it is with the object of getting an explanation from the noble Marquess the Postmaster General that I have put down this question.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (The Marquess of LONDONDERRY): My Lords, the question which has been put to me by my noble friend is, if I may venture to say so, a very pertinent and practical one, and I do not in the least regret that it has been asked. The matter is creating certain doubts—I might almost say misapprehensions—in the minds of the public at large, but if it had been possible the Post Office would gladly have avoided the transfer referred to. But they had no other course open to them owing to the pressure of business and the likelihood of that pressure being increased. The Post Office building at St. Martin's-le-Grand, which had hitherto been devoted to sorting purposes, was found to be absolutely inadequate for the work, and as regards the employees there was danger that the sanitary arrangements would be insufficient. To give an idea of the increase in the work during the last few years, I may state that from a return taken in November, 1895, the number of articles posted in the E.C. district weekly was 8,300,000 and the number delivered in the E.C. district was 4,221,000, making a total of 12,500,000. From the latest return of November, 1899, the numbers had risen to 9,536,000 (an increase of nearly 15 per cent.) and 4,761,000 (an increase of nearly 13 per cent.) respectively, or a total of 14,290,000. The number of articles despatched from St. Martin's-le-Grand to places abroad was in May, 1896, 2,033,000. The number is now 2,842,000 (an increase of nearly 40 per cent.), but this is temporarily swollen by the large amount of correspondence which is now sent weekly to the troops in South Africa. Owing also to the reduction of rates of the inland letter postage in 1897 the bulk of the articles sent through the post has materially increased, and this is a serious factor as regards the space available in the sorting office. I think I have shown your Lordships by these figures that some movement was necessary, and it was absolutely impossible to continue the whole of the work in the old building. Consequently my predecessor decided to transfer, roughly speaking, one-half of the duties of St. Martin's-le-Grand to what is now known as Mount Pleasant, a building one mile off on the site of what was formerly the Coldbath Fields prison. For some years a large portion of the business of the parcel post has been carried on there, and on Monday last it was opened for its new work. I do not deny that there has been a certain amount of inconvenience to the public in connection with the transfer, and I do not attempt to shirk any responsibility, but I can only ask your Lordships, and through you the public, to exercise the leniency which is called for when there is a transfer of such a large number of employés and plant. The site of the new building is on the extreme edge of the E.C. district, but it was the only site available for a building of the dimensions necessary, and, as your Lordships know, it belonged to the Government. The duties transferred to Mount Pleasant were those relating to the postal arrangements connected with the provinces. The foreign mails and all the postal arrangements connected with London will remain at St. Martin's-le-Grand. I wish particularly to impress upon your Lordships that practically there is no alteration in the hours of posting in any district in London as a result of the change, except in the E.C. district. There may be certain delay in connection with letters posted in London in the middle or early part of the day. Letters posted in the south or east of London and intended for the south and east provinces will have further to go to Mount Pleasant than they had to the old Post Office. But there will be a corresponding gain in point of time with regard to letters posted in the north and west for the north and west provinces, for the reason that those districts are nearer to Mount Pleasant. Except as regards the E.C. district there will be no alteration in the hours of posting for the night mails to the provinces. At Mount Pleasant the hours of posting will be the same now as they have hitherto been at St. Martin's-le-Grand, and the hours of posting for the general night mails will be maintained all over the district. But letters intended for despatch to the provinces by mails other than the general night mails should as a rule, if posted elsewhere than at Mount Pleasant, be posted about half an hour earlier. I may mention that in the E.C. district letters will no longer be able to be posted in pillar and wall boxes with an extra halfpenny stamp up to seven p.m. It has been found that of the 50,000 letters per night so posted an average of only 700 bear the extra stamp, and it is not practicable to examine 50,000 letters for the sake of 700. It has therefore been decided to abolish the wall and pillar boxes for late-fee letters. I wish it to be understood that although that facility is taken away the facilities offered are satisfactory, because at every postoffice in the east-central district the facilities for late-fee posting will exist as before, and no one will have to walk more than 200 yards in the east central district in order to reach a post-office. The main point to which exception has been taken is that late-post letters must be posted at St. Martin's-le-Grand at 7.30 instead of at 7.45, as hitherto. The pressure at the General Post Office has been so great that it has been found absolutely necessary to remove a certain portion of the work to another building. It takes a quarter of an hour to get from St. Martin's-le-Grand to the new building, and that quarter of an hour has to be made up in some way, otherwise the mails would not catch the trains. After considering the matter very carefully my predecessor arrived at the conclusion, in which I concur, that that quarter of an hour should be taken off the time allowed at St. Martin's-le-Grand. I believe the inconvenience has been greatly exaggerated. I can only say, on behalf of myself and the Department over which I preside, that we do not think we are asking too much of the public, having regard to the convenience of every part of the country, and that we believe we shall be able to carry on our enormous and daily increasing task in a manner which will give satisfaction to the country.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN SHOPS.

LORD AVEBURY: My Lords, I rise to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the long hours of labour in shops. In a recent debate on the Early Closing Bill the noble Marquess, while admitting the length of hours of labour in shops, objected to the Bill, on the ground, mainly, or at any rate among other reasons, that though it was drawn in accordance with a unanimous resolution of the House of Commons, and had passed through two Committees of that House, it did not, in his judgment, sufficiently protect the interests of the consumer. The loss of the Bill has caused great disappointment to the shopkeeping community, and I beg to ask the noble Marquess whether he will consent to the appointment of a Committee to consider the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I do not think that this matter is at all an unfit one for the consideration of this House, but I should demur to the appointment of a Committee so late in the session, when it would hardly be possible to obtain the attendance of Peers who would be adequately fitted for examining into a question of such complexity. The great novelty of the proposal made by the noble Lord imposes upon us the duty of examining very carefully what the effect will be of limiting the hours of labour in shops, and how far the interest of various classes of the community would be injuriously touched by it. In some recent debates we have had the doctrine laid down, which, I confess, very much alarmed me, that whenever a Commission or Committee which was appointed by the Government was unanimous on a subject, the Government was thereupon bound to accept the conclusions to which they had arrived. I entirely demur to any such suggestion. I have no belief in the infallibility of Commissions or Committees, though they may be of great assistance to Parliament in the investigations of social phenomena which it is their duty to make. I will not pledge myself as to the course we shall pursue with respect to the recommendations which may be made, but I entirely concur with the noble Lord that this is a suitable matter for Parliament to investigate. It is a matter of extreme difficulty, and I hope that some care will be taken to appoint an impartial Committee.

LORD AVEBURY: I am very much obliged to the noble Marquess for consenting to the appointment of a Select Committee. I quite concur that it should not be a partisan Committee, and I am sure the advocates of early closing would be desirous that it should be a Committee which would inspire the confidence of your Lordships' House. I beg to give notice that I will move for the appointment of a Committee at the commencement of next session.

COLONIAL MARRIAGES (DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER) BILL [H.L.]

SHANNON WATER AND ELECTRIC POWER BILL.

Order [22nd March], That the Shannon Water and Electric Power Bill be committed to the Committee to be nominated by the Committee of Selection for the consideration of other Private Bills relating to electric power, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the order be discharged."—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

*MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) remarked that he quite understood the reasons for removing this Bill from the Special Committee mentioned, but thought that it was important it should be referred to a Committee of no inferior status.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith) replied that the Bill was not affected in any way by the questions which the Special Committee had been appointed to consider in connection with the Electric Lighting Bills. The only question involved in it was one relating to fisheries, and he really could not understand how it came to be put in the group of Electric Lighting Bills. The Special Committee which had been sitting since the beginning of May had still a heavy Bill to deal with, and under the circumstances he hoped that the House would accept this resolution and allow this particular Bill to go to another Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

GREAT INDIAN PENINSULA RAILWAY COMPANY BILL [ANNUITIES] (BY ORDER).

Resolution reported:—"That it is expedient to authorise the creation of Annuities to be charged on and payable out of the Revenues of India in lieu of the sum of money amounting to £34,859,217 17s. 6d. agreed upon for the purchase by the Secretary of State in Council of India of the undertaking of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, and the payment of any costs and expenses incurred by the said Secretary of State under any Act of the present session for vesting the said undertaking in the said Secretary of State in Council of India; and also any costs, charges, and expenses of obtaining and passing the said Act not provided by the surplus profits arising from the said undertaking for the half-year ending the 30th day of June, 1900."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

*MR. JOHN ELLIS said that he yesterday took the somewhat unusual course of objecting to this stage being passed. In view of the fact that it was merely a Report from the House in Committee, he would not enter into the matter at length; but he would like again to emphasise his opinion that this matter should have been dealt with in a public instead of a private Bill, and he proposed to raise that point when the Bill itself came before the House.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee) said he understood it would not be competent for anyone at this stage to raise the point alluded to by his hon. friend, but he would like to recall to the memory of the noble Lord a strong Report signed by himself on a similar occasion, protesting against dealing with matters of this character in private Bills. He would further like to ask what the noble Lord anticipated would be the future history of the Bill. Would it go to the Unopposed Private Bill Committee, or would it be sent to a Select Committee? He held that in a matter of this magnitude the House should be afforded an opportunity, through a Select Committee, of examining the provisions of a Bill which imposed a charge of 35 millions on the Indian revenues, and he believed that if the noble Lord would only suggest that the Bill be sent to a Select Committee that would at once be done.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I think there is still some misunderstanding with regard to the Bill.

As a matter of fact, it was not necessary to apply to Parliament in order to acquire possession of this railway. Contracts were made and sanctioned by Acts of Parliament passed many years ago, which enabled the East India Company to enter into negotiations with certain railway companies, for guaranteeing the interest on their capital and for an option of purchase. I was informed by my legal advisers that that option of purchase could be exercised, and that all the arrangements could be made so far as the purchase is concerned. But the stock of this railway is largely held by trustees, and I am told that unless some special arrangement is made in connection with annuities it may be very difficult for trustees to hold their stock hereafter. The transaction is quite simple and above board, and I am ready to agree to any procedure that may be desired, provided it will not delay the conclusion of this business. But I am bound by the form and practice of the House. It is a private Bill, and I understand that it will go to the Chairman of Ways and Means. I assume that it is not opposed, and that it will in the ordinary course come back to this House without going to a Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company Bill, that they have power to make provision therein pursuant to the said Resolution.
—(Secretary Lord George Hamilton.)

DUBLIN CORPORATION BILL AND CLONTARF URBAN DISTRICT COUN- CIL BILL (JOINT COMMITTEE).

VOL. LXXXIV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Dublin Corporation Bill and the Clontarf Urban District Council Bill, That the parties promoting the Dublin Corporation Bill had stated that the evidence of Frederick C. Pilkington, D.L., J.P., of Westbury, Stillorgan, county Dublin, was essential to their case; and, it having been proved that his attendance could not be procured without the intervention of the House, he had been instructed to move that the said Frederick C. Pilkington do attend the said Committee on Monday next, 25th June, at half-past Eleven of the clock.

Ordered, That Frederick C. Pilkington do attend the Joint Committee on the Dublin Corporation Bill and the Clontarf Urban District Council Bill on Monday next, at half-past Eleven of the clock.

W. Russell.*)

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR — LORD ROBERTS'S PROCLAMATION ANNEXING THE ORANGE FREE STATE.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can say what has been the effect of Lord Roberts's proclamation of annexation of the Orange Free State on the status of the inhabitants; and whether any such inhabitants found fighting with arms in their possession will be treated as prisoners of war or as rebels.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The effect of Lord Roberts's proclamation of annexation was that the inhabitants of the Orange Free State became British subjects. Lord Roberts had undertaken by his proclamations to the burghers of the Orange Free State that those desisting from hostility and found staying in their homes and quietly pursuing their ordinary occupations would not be made to suffer in their persons or property on account of their having taken up arms in obedience to the order of their Government. The treatment of all other persons, may, I think, be safely left to Lord Roberts.

MARTIAL LAW—TREATMENT OF CAPE REBELS.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Minutes of the late Ministry of Cape Colony as to the treatment of rebels in Cape Colony.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not think it would be desirable that these Papers should be laid upon the Table at present, but I am communicating with the present Cape Government on the subject.

MEDICAL TREATMENT OF SOLDIERS ON FURLOUGH—CASE OF PRIVATE MITCHELL.

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the case of Private Mitchell, of the Wiltshire Regiment, who was shot in both ankles at the battle of Modder River, and is now an inmate of the Lambeth workhouse; and will he state why Mitchell was turned out of Woolwich Hospital and compelled to seek shelter at a friend's house in Lambeth; and will he inform the House what arrangements have been made by the War Office for the reception, housing, and maintenance of private soldiers invalided home from South Africa, whether in consequence of being wounded or from other causes; and whether any definite system of pensions has yet been fixed by the War Office for the widows of officers and men losing their lives during the South African campaign.

MR. MARKS (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I beg at the same time to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the case of Private Mitchell, of the Wiltshire Regiment, who was wounded in both legs at the battle of Modder River, and was recently discharged from Woolwich Hospital because the hospital authorities wanted room, and subsequently admitted into the Lambeth workhouse infirmary in a weak state of health; whether the case has been reported to the War Office by the Lambeth guardians; and what action, if any, the War Office intends to take in the case.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. WYNDRHAM, Dover): There are over 7,000 beds reserved in the various military hospitals for private soldiers invalided from South Africa. On reaching convalescence the soldier is transferred to a convalescent home. We have ample accommodation for the first stage of recovery in hospitals and for the second in homes. But many soldiers prefer to proceed on sick furlough to their friends. This is allowed when their health justifies it. They are, in that case, provided with sufficient funds and with a printed statement for their guidance which contains this paragraph—

"Soldiers on furlough who require medical aid shall apply for it to the nearest military station. When this is impracticable they may apply to a civil practitioner, to whom they will show this furlough paper, and who will be allowed to charge for attendance at the rate laid down on Army Form O, 1667."

Arrangements had been made to send Private Mitchell to a convalescent home, but, at his own request, he was allowed to go on furlough to Croydon. On leaving hospital he received £7 17s. 6d. pay. Private Mitchell states that the people with whom he intended to stay had left Croydon. He accordingly proceeded to London, and, feeling ill, went to the Morley Hotel, 112, Lambeth Road. His health did not improve, and, when he had spent two days and two nights in bed, the manager sent for a doctor, who ordered his removal to the infirmary. A gentleman at the hotel applied to the commanding officer, St. George's Barracks, for his removal to a military hospital. The reply did not arrive before his removal. He was accordingly visited in the infirmary and removed in a military ambulance to the Station Hospital in Rochester Row. I beg to thank the hon. Members who, by raising this question, have given me an opportunity of stating the facts at a length which will not, I hope, be considered excessive in view of its importance. There has been much comment on this case, and I shall be obliged if the press will give equal publicity to the fact that civilians who find a soldier left stranded on their hands should apply to the nearest military authority, and not despatch him incontinently to a pauper institution.

2ND BATTALION WILTSHIRE VOLUNTEERS—CASE OF JOHN KING.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (Wiltshire, Cricklade): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can inform the House of the reasons which led on the 25th of May to the reduction of Sergeant John King, of the 2nd battalion of the Wiltshire Regiment of Volunteers, to the ranks, and his discharge on the same day from the force on account of his reduction to the ranks, and if he can inform the House by whose authority he was dismissed; if there is any appeal to the War Office from the above dismissal; and if he is aware that Sergeant John King has been a member of his corps for twenty-five years and a non-commissioned officer for twenty years, and that he has on several occasions shot for England in rifle competitions and holds Her Majesty's decoration for long service and good conduct.

The following question on the same subject also appeared on the Paper:—

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): To ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been directed to the recent reduction to the ranks and eventual dismissal of Sergeant John King from the Devizes detachment of the 2nd Wilts Rifle Volunteers in consequence of a speech made by him at the South Wroxall Liberal Club, in which he adversely criticised the policy of the Government in South Africa; whether he is aware that Sergeant King was a member of the English twenty at Bisley and an alderman of the Wilts County Council; and, whether the Secretary of State for War will consider the revision of the sentence.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Sergeant King, whose service is correctly stated in the question, was reduced to the ranks for inefficiency, and was consequently discharged by the commanding officer of the battalion, both proceedings being in accordance with the Regulations and the Volunteer Act, which give such officer full powers both to reduce and discharge a Volunteer, subject only to the Queen's pleasure. The case has been carefully considered, and the Secretary of State sees no reason for interfering with the lawful award of the commanding officer.

VOLUNTEER CAMPS OF INSTRUCTION—OFFICERS' COMMAND PAY.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the case of officers commanding regimental districts, under Army Order 119 of this year, who when in command of Volunteer brigades at camps of instruction have their command pay as officers commanding such districts deducted from their field allowance, or acting staff pay, of one guinea, granted in accordance with such Order during the time they are in camp with their Volunteer brigades, and whether he can see his way to bring about the alteration of such Order so as at least to avoid such deduction.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Command pay is given for one duty and acting staff pay for another. The same officer cannot receive both rates of pay, because he does not perform both duties. The command pay is given to the officer who takes command of the district during the colonel's absence.

PROMOTIONS FROM THE RANKS.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether commanding officers of units serving in South Africa have been asked to recommend for commissions two non-commissioned officers from each battalion who shall be not over twenty-five years of age and unmarried; and whether, seeing that these conditions may debar non-commissioned officers otherwise meritorious, including some who have commanded companies in action and have been mentioned in despatches for distinguished service, they may not be made subject to exceptions, and commissions be granted in special cases at least with a view to departmental employment.

*MR. WYNDHAM: We know nothing of any such instructions. Lord Roberts was asked to recommend for commissions a few non-commissioned officers who had performed good and meritorious service as apart from distinguished service in the field; these were to be under thirty years of age and unmarried. No restrictions are imposed on recommendations for distinguished service in the field.

BRIGADE SIGNALLING OFFICERS' PAY.

MR. HUDSON (Hertfordshire, Hitchin): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, as the Divisional Signalling Officers in South Africa are drawing extra or Staff Captain's pay, he will also increase the pay of the Brigade Signalling Officers on the Staff of the Brigade, especially those who have been engaged in Natal, where, owing to the nature of the country, signalling has been of such importance, any other method of communication having been impossible.

*MR. WYNDHAM: It has not been hitherto considered necessary to appoint more than one staff officer for signalling in each division. It is possible that the experience of the war may lead to a modification of this rule; we shall await the reports of the generals in the field.

IMPERIAL PENNY POSTAGE—EXTENSION TO ORANGE RIVER COLONY AND THE TRANSVAAL.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he has extended the Imperial penny postage system to the Orange River Colony and the Transvaal, South Africa.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The question of extending penny postage to the Orange River Colony was taken up by the Postmaster General immediately on the announcement of the annexation, and is now under consideration by Her Majesty's Government. The question as to the South African Republic is scarcely yet ripe for discussion.

DECEASED OFFICERS' WAR MEDALS.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether, seeing that it is the custom to send to relatives of officers who have died on service in the field the medals to which these officers have become entitled by that service, he will explain why the Sudan Queen's medal has been refused to an officer who lost his life in the 1896 campaign on the Nile.

*MR. WYNDHAM: My hon. and gallant friend probably refers to the case of Captain Fenwick, of the Royal Sussex Regiment, who died in the Dongola Expedition of 1896. For that expedition no Queen's medal was granted.

SALISBURY PLAIN MANŒUVRES—COMMISSARIAT BREAKDOWN.

MR. HOLLAND (Yorkshire, W.R., Rotherham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the breakdown of the commissariat of the Manchester Volunteers on the occasion of their recent encampment on Salisbury Plain, whereby the men were practically without bread for two days, receiving in substitution hard biscuits which required a hammer to break them; and whether, in consequence of the general dissatisfaction of the men with their food arrangements, supplies were subsequently obtained from their friends at home; and, if so, whether he can give the name of the officer responsible for this state of things, and undertake that steps shall be taken in future to avoid its recurrence.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Three of the four battalions of the Manchester Volunteer Brigade at Salisbury Plain did not employ the Government bread contractors, but made their own arrangements. The private contractors partly failed to carry out the supply, and 640lb. of the biscuit ordinarily issued to the troops was supplied from the Government stores to make up the deficiency. Nothing is known of any supply from friends at home, some 250 miles distant.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): Does the hon. Gentleman wish the House to understand that the regiments which had to get their food through the War Office made no complaint? That certainly is not the case.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I did not mean the House to understand that. It is not in my power to give any such information. The deficiency arose out of private contracts entered into by Volunteer brigades this year as hitherto, and not through any default on the part of the authorities.

LORD BALCARRES: Is it not the fact that the quartermasters of many of the regiments were directed by the War Office as to whom they were to apply to for food, and that they were really not given a free hand?

*MR. WYNDHAM: Another question raises that issue. In respect to bread and meat the Volunteers were allowed to exercise the discretion they enjoyed before, but in respect of canteen stores that was not always the case.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it has been brought to his notice that some of the Volunteer battalions encamped on Salisbury Plain are not permitted to make their own contracts and arrangements with reference to canteens, as in former years, and that some are even compelled to deal exclusively with the Canteen and Mess Co-operative Society, Limited; and whether he will take steps to give to Volunteer battalions the same freedom of choice in connection with this matter as heretofore.

*MR. WYNDHAM: For military reasons it was considered expedient to form a district contract for all units encamping on Salisbury Plain. The board to select the tenders was composed of one Regular, four Militia and four Volunteer officers; and two contractors, viz., Messrs. Dickeson and Sons and the Canteen and Mess Co-operative Society, were selected.

POST OFFICE VOLUNTEERS—CAMP LEAVE.

COLONEL DALBIAC (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the same privileges can be extended to the assistant postmen as to the other classes of Post Office employees in regard to leave, to enable them to attend Volunteer camps during the present year.

MR. HANBURY: The privilege of leave on full pay to attend Volunteer camps is confined to those officers whose whole time is at the disposal of the Department, and the Postmaster General, I am informed, sees no reason for extending it to assistant postmen and others who give only a portion of their time and are not required to do a full day's work.

ALDERSHOT MANŒUVRES—HEAT CASUALTIES.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state what action will be taken, by court-martial, by reprimand, or otherwise, to determine the responsibility for the Aldershot casualties, and to impose upon those found responsible any appropriate penalties; and whether the contractors, if any, who failed to supply the troops with food will be struck off the lists in future, or otherwise dealt with in respect of their breach of contract.

*MR. WYNDHAM: As I have already explained to the House in the debate on Army Estimates of the 19th inst.,† the steps taken by the Commander-in-Chief are deemed sufficient. The civilians employed had no contract with the Government. The question of their continued employment rests with the officer commanding the corps concerned, who will no doubt take proper notice of what occurred.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the men sent to hospital at Aldershot on account of illness caused by the heat on the 11th inst. are subjected to hospital stoppages, and whether the allotments to the families of such as are married will therefore cease; and whether any pensions will be payable to the widows, if any, of those who died on that day.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The regulations admit of the full remission of the stoppage in such cases, the discretion rests entirely with the general officer in command. The separation allowance to the families will not cease. The question of pension will be referred to the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund, who have control of the funds available for this purpose.

GENERAL STAFF AT ALDERSHOT.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can now state when the General commanding the troops at Aldershot was appointed, and whether this general officer, who entered the Army in the year 1850, has been able to transact any business or be present at any field days lately at Aldershot; and if he will give the number of troops now stationed at Aldershot.

*MR. WYNDHAM: This officer was appointed on the 15th December, 1899, to command the Aldershot district. On the 22nd May he proceeded on sick leave, but he expects shortly to return to Aldershot. The number of troops stationed there is 29,400.

MR. JEFFREYS: Is the same staff which had been considered sufficient for a division of 15,000 men now considered sufficient for 29,000?

*MR. WYNDHAM: That question hardly arises out of my answer. We have a sufficient staff. As my hon. friend knows, a great number of our general officers are in South Africa.

VOLUNTEER CAMPS—MEDICAL OFFICERS.

MR. BILLSON (Halifax): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the Army Order relating to the payment of Volunteers in camp will limit the payment to medical officers to one such officer for each corps, so that when a corps is entitled to two or more medical officers all but one will have to pay their own expenses; and, if so, why medical officers should be placed in such a position.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Order allows pay for one medical officer in each unit, one additional for each brigade, and three for each bearer company. This is considered sufficient.

MACHYNLLETH RIFLE RANGE.

COLONEL PRYCE-JONES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he is aware that work on the Machynlleth Rifle Range was suspended on 12th May last when near completion, although the range is urgently required; and if he can say when sanction will be given for the range to be completed.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Sanction has been given for the completion of the range.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON INDIAN EXPENDITURE.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, looking to the use that is being made of Indian troops for Imperial purposes in South Africa and China, and looking also to the distressed condition of India, the Government will take into early consideration the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Indian Expenditure as to the apportionment of charge between India and the Imperial Exchequer.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I agree with the hon. Baronet that no time should be lost in coming to a decision on the recommendations of this Commission. I am already in communication with the Departments concerned, and I hope shortly to be able to conclude the whole matter.

INDIAN FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he will state at what date the explanatory memorandum of the Indian Financial Statement will be issued to Members; and will the total figures be expressed in tens of rupees, so as to allow of comparison with previous statements.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The explanatory memorandum is in the press, and will be issued to members as early as possible. The total figures will be expressed in pounds, so as to allow of a comparison of the figures in the Estimates with those in the accounts. The figures in the return of net income and expenditure from 1888-9 to the present time, which has just been presented, have been re-cast, and shown in pounds, in order to facilitate a comparison of the accounts during that period.

AFGHANISTAN—PROHIBITION OF TRADE WITH INDIA.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the Ameer of Cabul has forbidden the export of horses to and the import of salt from India; and whether the Government of India has any means of checking such action on the part of a Prince who receives a subsidy from the Indian Treasury.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Government of India has received reports from its agents which seem to confirm the action imputed to the Ameer in the hon.

Member's question. As regards the second question, the hon. Member is aware that the Ameer is a sovereign who is independent in the conduct of his internal administration.

INDIAN MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

MR. MACLEAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he can say what is now the total strength of the British and native troops withdrawn from the Indian establishment for service elsewhere, including the troops under orders for China; and whether the Government of India is taking any steps to supply the places of these troops.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The total strength of the British and native troops withdrawn from the Indian establishment for service elsewhere, including the troops under orders for China, is approximately 16,000. We hope that the British troops now serving in South Africa will shortly return to India, but so far no steps have been taken to replace the native troops serving abroad.

INDIAN BUDGET.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, looking to the Viceroy's statement that the famine in India exceeds in intensity any previously recorded visitation, he will arrange for the Indian Budget to be brought forward at an early date.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Indian Budget, I suppose, will be taken at the ordinary time.

MR. MACLEAN: Is there any special reason why the Indian Budget should be delayed until the last days of the session?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, there is no special reason.

TURKISH GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS—ENGLISH TENDERERS.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the tenders of an English firm for the repair and re armament of the Turkish fleet are below those of the German firm of Krupp and Co.; whether the contract is likely to be given to the German firm in consequence of political pressure; and whether Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople will be instructed to give support to the desire of the Turkish Government to decide this question on its financial and technical merits.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Her Majesty's Government have no information to confirm the statement in the first paragraph. They are informed that a contract has been signed for the repair of eight Turkish ironclads by a firm at Genoa. It is stated that the armament is to be supplied by Messrs. Krupp. Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople has already brought the claim of a British firm to the notice of the Sultan, and His Excellency has since been authorised to express the hope that British firms may receive a fair share in the orders for war material given by the Turkish Government.

RAILWAYS IN ASIA MINOR—RUSSIAN CONCESSIONS.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether an Imperial Iradé has been issued by the Sultan giving to Russian subjects the sole right of constructing railways in a large portion of Asia Minor fronting the Black Sea; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government have made any protest against this monopoly and new sphere of interest, the practical effect of which will be to prevent the industrial development of Asia Minor.

*MR. BRODRICK: Her Majesty's Government understand that an arrangement sanctioned by Imperial Iradé has been arrived at between Turkey and Russia by which the Turkish Government reserve to themselves the right to construct railways in the North of Asia Minor, and in case they do not make the railways themselves they undertake to grant the exclusive right of construction to Russian subjects on the same terms as the concession of the Anatolian Railways to the Germans. Her Majesty's Government have no official cognisance of this arrangement, and no protest has been made against it.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Will the Government protest when they get the official information?

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN DISTURBANCES—RECENT OPERATIONS—TIENTSIN AND PEKING.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has received any further information relating to the safety of British subjects in Peking and the progress of the relieving force.

*MR. BRODRICK: I regret to say we have no authentic information. Our last communication from Sir Claude MacDonald is nine days old. The Admiral's force when last heard of seven days ago was between thirty and forty miles north-west of Tientsin and the same distance from Peking. Tientsin, which is thirty miles from Ta-ku, is now cut off from Ta-ku, and telegraphic messages from the latter place have to be conveyed by steamer to Chefoo, a distance of about 250 miles. The latest news we have is a despatch from Rear-Admiral Bruce, which is as follows—

"Ta-ku, via Chefoo, 21st June.—There has been no communication from the Commander-in-Chief for seven days nor with Tientsin for five days. Allies hold Ta-ku forts and Tong-ku securely, and they will advance for the relief of Tientsin when in sufficient strength. Troops are expected from Hong Kong to-morrow, and 300 from Wei-hai-wei the day after to-morrow. It is believed that fighting is constantly going on round Tientsin. Our garrison there should be about 3,000 men. Following proclamation was agreed to this morning to be issued at once: 'The admirals and senior naval officers of the allied Powers in China desire to make known to all Viceroy and authorities of the coasts and rivers, cities, and provinces of China that they intend to use armed force only against Boxers and people who oppose them on their march to Peking for the rescue of their fellow-countrymen.'"

COMMAND OF THE BRITISH FORCES IN CHINA—CO-OPERATION OF JAPAN WITH THE EUROPEAN POWERS.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury the following question, of which I have given private notice:—Whether Her Majesty's Government propose to appoint a general officer to command Her

What has been done is this: on the Parliament of the Commonwealth are conferred, in respect of a number of matters, concurrent powers with those which have been enjoyed, and will still be enjoyed, by the Parliaments and the Governments of the States. The States in respect of these matters will still retain their powers, and the only question which can arise is as to whether any Act of the State Legislature will be ultra vires. In regard to Article 51 no controversy can arise as to any power having been taken away from the State Legislatures, because the States will retain all the powers they have enjoyed. The question that will arise is a totally different question. In the immense majority of cases it would not be whether the Commonwealth Parliament or the State Parliament had power to legislate on the matter, because both undoubtedly had. The scheme of the Bill is different. The question that would arise is this:—Under the 109th article of the Constitution, if the law of the Commonwealth and the laws of the State were in conflict, the law of the Commonwealth prevailed. The question would not be as to the relative powers of the Commonwealth and the States inter se, for in a question of the construction of the Commonwealth statute with the State statute, if they bore on the same subject, the Commonwealth law prevails. That is not a question which will be affected by the terms of the arrangement now arrived at. An appeal on the question of the construction of a statute will be absolutely free as at present. That is to say, if Her Majesty in Council thought fit to grant leave of appeal there would be no conflict. My hon. and learned friend referred to a very interesting case affecting a Chinaman, and he asked whether the State Legislature had not acted ultra vires in legislating on that subject. In Australia that question cannot arise, because no jurisdiction is conferred on the Commonwealth Parliament to legislate with regard to aliens, yet the State Legislature would retain all its powers, because the powers are concurrent. In regard to the other case mentioned by my hon. and learned friend as to rivers and lakes, the great rivers and lakes of America concern another Power than the Dominion of Canada; but no such question could, of course, arise in Australia, and therefore it could not lead to complication. I would point out, moreover, that the Amendment as proposed does not bear on an appeal in any class of cases whatever. As the Bill came from Australia, in certain classes of cases resting on the interpretation of some doubtful and obscure words there was no authority or power to give leave to appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council. There could be no appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council on any constitutional question unless it related to the public interests of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions. Now the effect of that was that in an excepted class of cases they set up two Courts with co-ordinate jurisdiction, and as to that particular class of case the High Court and the Privy Council are co-ordinate with no possibility of appeal from the one to the other. It might have been argued on the Bill as it came from Australia that the High Court in these cases would not have been bound by the decision of the Privy Council. No such contention can possibly be raised under the clause as it is now settled, because there is the power of appeal to Her Majesty in Council in every case. The only difference is that while in the immense majority of cases leave to appeal is to be granted as heretofore by application to Her Majesty in Council, such special leave in one small class of cases—which affect Australian interests almost exclusively—is to be granted from the High Court, and the Privy Council is recognised as the Appellate Court. It has been asked, if this leave is to be got from the High Court, on what principles will the High Court act in granting or refusing the application? I confess that I have some confidence in the action of the High Court. It has been the glory of our race all over the world, that the Judges in every part of the United Kingdom and in every British Colony have acted absolutely independently of political considerations. As these Judges have acted in the past I believe they will act in the future, and I think it will be found that there is no ground for any distrust or apprehension as to the way in which the High Court will exercise the powers with which it is entrusted in this very small and special class of cases as to whether there shall be an appeal to the Privy Council if the interests of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions are affected. It is very difficult indeed to see how a question of the distribution of powers between two

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I have a draft of a Bill in this direction very nearly settled. It will be, I have every reason to believe, a non-controversial Bill, and I will consult my right hon. friend the Leader of the House with a view to seeing when it can be introduced.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT— MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS.

MR. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, under Clause 11 of the First Schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, a workman is entitled to submit himself for examination by the qualified medical practitioner appointed for the district in which he resides by the Secretary of State, when the medical practitioner appointed by his employer has given a certificate upon his condition with which he is not satisfied, although the case has not been before a committee, arbitrator or judge, in consequence of the employer and the workman having previously agreed to pay and receive a fixed weekly sum as compensation.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The provisions of paragraph 11 of the First Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act apply to any workman "receiving weekly payments under the Act." Whether any particular case of agreement is "under the Act" is a question which can only be decided authoritatively on the facts of the case by a court of law, and I am unable to express an opinion on it in general terms.

SCOTTISH TRAINING COLLEGES.

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the attention of the Education Department has been called to the inadequacy of the number of students in the training colleges (especially in the western division) to meet the increasing demand for teachers owing to the growth of the number of children attending schools, and the reduction of the size of classes enjoined by the Code; and whether the Department will consider the necessity of taking measures to increase the number of adequately trained teachers.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): In reply to the question of the hon. Member, I have to state that the Department has, from time to time, received representations to the effect that the supply of trained teachers is not sufficient. The relation between supply and demand is at all times a difficult one, influenced as it must be by various circumstances. It must be remembered that the training colleges are not the only source from which the supply of trained teachers may be recruited; but the Department is prepared to consider any proposals for maintaining the adequacy of that supply.

MR. CROMBIE: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the attention of the Education Department has been called to the dissatisfaction felt by Queen's Scholarship candidates who duly qualify but are refused admission to the training colleges in order to give place to candidates entering without examination under Article 70 (d) 6, and 95 (a) 2; and whether the Department will either give a preference to Queen's Scholar candidates or impose some further competitive test on the other classes of candidates referred to.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: Candidates for admission to training colleges may qualify either by the Queen's Scholarship examination or by the Leaving Certificate examination. The question as to which examination produces the most promising class of student is one which can be settled only by experience, and the Department is not prepared to interfere with the discretion of the training college authorities in this respect, or to impose any further competitive test upon either class.

SLOUGH RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received any official information regarding the railway accident which took place at Slough Station on Saturday last; whether the information tends to show that the accident resulted from an unusually large number of trains being put upon the lines for the convenience of visitors to the Windsor races; and whether he will give instructions for this point being thoroughly sifted in the course of the Board of Trade inquiry into the causes of the accident.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): Yes, Sir; the Board of Trade received an official report of the accident, and an inspecting officer is engaged in holding an inquiry. I understand from that officer that it is unlikely that the number of trains had anything to do with the accident, but he will no doubt bear the hon. Member's point in mind during the investigation.

LIVERPOOL CENSUS RETURNS.

SIR JOHN WILLOX (Liverpool, Everton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the last report of the medical officer of health for the city of Liverpool, in which allegations are made of the inaccuracy and unreliability of the census returns of the last census, and the consequent errors in the calculation of the mortality averages for the decennial period; and, whether measures will be adopted to ensure greater correctness in taking the next census by the employment of more competent enumerators or otherwise.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The question of my hon. friend appears to be founded on a misapprehension. No allegations are made in the report referred to of the inaccuracy and unreliability of the Census returns. The medical officer appeared to have been referring to the estimates of population in the years between 1881 and 1891. These estimates were based on the increase in population in the ten years between 1871 and 1881, and the result of the last Census showed that in the case of Liverpool the rate of increase had not been maintained. There appears, however, to be no reason to suppose that the Census returns themselves were inaccurate.

G.P.O.—TRANSFER TO MOUNT PLEASANT—POSTAL RE-ARRANGEMENTS, DELAYS, ETC.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will state who is responsible for the delay caused to the merchants and business men of great towns and cities in this country, notably Sheffield and Newcastle, through the misdirection and delay in forwarding numbers of London letters, and will he consult some leading men of business in commercial circles before he deprives the public of posting facilities hitherto enjoyed.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg also to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he is aware that many letters posted in London before 6 p.m. on Monday, 18th June, were not delivered in Sheffield on the following day, and will he explain the delay, and whether the causes of it were foreseen at the Post Office, and why no intimation of possible delay was given to the public beforehand.

MR. HANBURY: As the hon. Member is no doubt aware, owing to the want of space at St. Martin's-le-Grand, the provincial despatching work formerly done there has had to be transferred to a new office in the Farringdon Road, part of the site of the Coldbath Fields Prison. The transfer of a force of 2,500 men to new surroundings was naturally attended with some temporary disadvantage to the work, and on this account the correspondence could not be dealt with altogether as expeditiously as under normal conditions. The Postmaster General regrets that any inconvenience should have been caused to the public in carrying out this change, and he begs to assure the hon. Member that every effort is being used to restore the regular working of the service at the earliest possible time.

MR. MADDISON: Can you answer the latter part of my question?

MR. HANBURY: I cannot answer that.

BRITISH MUSEUM—ANNUAL RETURN.

SIR HENRY HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can expedite the printing of the Annual Return of the British Museum, which was laid upon the Table of the House early in the session, and has not yet been delivered to Members.

MR. HANBURY: The Annual Return for 1899, finally revised for press by the authorities of the British Museum, was sent to the Treasury on 12th June, and forwarded to the printers on 14th June. The Report will be delivered on Monday next, the 25th.

IRISH GOLD ORNAMENTS—TREASURE TROVE.

MR. J. MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, having regard to the announcement to the Trustees of the British Museum by the Government of their intention to take proceedings with a view to a judicial decision on the title of the Museum to the recently acquired Irish gold ornaments, whether he will lay upon the Table the correspondence on the subject between the Treasury and the Trustees of the Museum, as well as the Report of the Departmental Committee presided over by Lord Rathmore.

MR. HANBURY (for Mr. A. J. BALFOUR): The correspondence is voluminous, and contains moreover the Law Officers' opinions, which it would be contrary to established practice to lay before Parliament. I propose, however, to present a summary in some detail of what has passed between the Treasury and the Trustees, but before doing so I shall submit such summary to the Trustees in order to ascertain whether it is in their judgment a fair representation of the case. The report of the Departmental Committee was presented to Parliament last year.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): Will the right hon. Gentleman add to the Return a copy of any regulations or minutes issued by the Treasury in respect of treasure trove since the passing of the Act of 1837, and also a note of legal proceedings, if any, which have since been instituted for the recovery of treasure trove.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must see the documents before I can promise to lay them on the Table. Perhaps my hon. friend will put his question on the Paper.

KILLYLEA NATIONAL SCHOOL.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why the teaching staff of the Killylea National School, county Armagh, which has been connected with the Board of National Education in Ireland for a period of seventeen years ending March 31st, 1900, have only received results fees for sixteen years; and whether any arrangement is being made to pay the one year's fees yet due.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): Results fees, as such, are not payable after the 1st of April, 1900; but teachers who taught under the results system up to the end of last financial year will receive an equivalent for such fees, based on the average payments for the last three years. The mode of payment is at present under consideration.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Will the right hon. Gentleman say what will be the course of business next week?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The first business on Monday will be the Report stage of the Australian Commonwealth Bill, and this will be followed by the Housing of the Working Classes Bill in Committee. I am not so sanguine as to suppose that we shall finish the latter Bill on Monday, and if we do not the proceedings on it will be continued on Tuesday. The Companies Bill will be introduced on Tuesday if the Housing of the Working Classes Bill is finished.

*MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): And when will the Irish Tithe Rent-Charge Bill be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On Thursday.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester): When will you take the Second Reading of the Factories and Workshops Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I have given all the information in my power about business.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRADE, ETC.

Ordered, That the Standing Committee on Trade, etc., have leave to sit this day till Four o'clock during the Sitting of the House.—(Mr. Laurence Hardy.)

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

Reported from the Standing Committee on Trade, etc., with Amendments.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 226.]

Minutes of the Proceedings of the Standing Committee to be printed. [No. 226.]

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 258.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND).

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The object of the Bill I have to introduce is to amend certain details in the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, in respect of which difficulties of working have cropped up. No useful purpose would be served by my going into those details, but I hope and believe the Bill will be found to be non-contentious.

Bill to amend Sections 42, 51, 54, 56, 57, 69, 103, 115, and 121 of The Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, and Articles 19, 24, and 36 of the Schedule to The Local Government (Application of Enactments) Order, 1898, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gerald Balfour and Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

"To amend Sections 42, 51, 54, 56, 57, 69, 103, 115, and 121 of The Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, and Articles 19, 24, and 36 of the Schedule to The Local Government (Application of Enactments) Order, 1898," presented, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 259.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT IRELAND (No. 2).

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: At the present time the procedure of Councils in Ireland cannot be altered except by Act of Parliament. We think it desirable to introduce an easier process and to provide for greater elasticity, and this Bill consequently proposes to enable it to be done by Provisional Order instead of by Act of Parliament.

Bill to provide for the alteration of the Local Government (Procedure of Councils) Order, 1899, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gerald Balfour and Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) (No. 2) BILL.

"To provide for the alteration of the Local Government (Procedure of Councils) Order, 1899," presented, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 260.]

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND).

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: This, my third Bill, is intended to enable guardians or unions in Ireland to send children to schools or institutions not situated in those unions, and also to enable them in certain cases to exceed the limit of land now allowed to be set apart for the erection of labourers' cottages.

Bill to amend the Poor Relief (Ireland) Acts, 1838 to 1892, with respect to relief given by the maintenance of lunatics and children, and with respect to the quantity of land which may be acquired under those Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gerald Balfour and Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

"To amend the Poor Relief (Ireland) Acts, 1838 to 1892, with respect to relief given by the maintenance of lunatics and children, and with respect to the quantity of land which may be acquired under those Acts," presented, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 261.]

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) in the Chair.]

Z

Clause 5 :—

Amendment again proposed—

"In page 2, line 14, to leave out from the word 'Notwithstanding,' to the word 'State,' in line 18, both inclusive."—(Mr. Secretary Chamberlain.)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.) : I have to ask the permission of the House to make a correction of a statement which I made on Monday last in dealing with this Amendment. I then said, or I am reported to have said, that I had received no official communication from the Government of the four States of Australia in reference to the proceedings which had taken place since the introduction of this Bill, and that, up to the present, I was not officially made aware of the opinions of the Governments of the four States. I find that that was a mistake. It would have been more correct to say that I had no public official statement, but I have been reminded by my hon. friend Mr. Barton of a matter which escaped my memory at the time—namely, that after the first arrangement was come to with the delegates I received on 25th May from the Government of New South Wales a telegram, which I thought then was confidential but which I am now told was not intended to be confidential, to the effect that the Prime Ministers of the four States of Victoria, New South Wales, Tasmania, and South Australia agreed to the arrangement which had been come to between the delegates and myself. I desire to state this, because the previous statement might have led to a misunderstanding and to the supposition that the delegates were acting without the authority of their Governments. Of course, I did not in the least intend to convey that; but I admit that my words were open to that construction, and I have to apologise to the Committee and to the delegates for the slip. It has, however, no particular relevance to the present Amendment. When we adjourned on the last occasion I had informed the Committee that I had communicated with the Governments of the different colonies in order to ascertain, if possible, what their views were with regard to the new arrangement which had been come to. At that time I had no complete account of their opinions. I have since received telegrams which I think I had better read to the Committee. The first is from Lord Beauchamp, New South Wales, received 20th June :—

"The Premier informs me that Victoria, Tasmania, and Queensland agree to the compromise in connection with Clause 74. New South Wales Parliament, now sitting, has expressed wish that altered clause should be submitted to it."

The next is a telegram from Lord Tennyson, South Australia, dated 20th June—

"Ministers reply as follows to your telegram 19th June :—They do not think that any difficulty will be caused if Imperial Parliament resolves to amend Bill as now proposed."

Lord Gormanston sent a telegram on 19th June as follows—

"Your telegram of 16th June received. My Government are quite satisfied with the clause set forth therein as the best under all the circumstances of the case."

With regard to Queensland, I have received a letter from Mr. Dickson, dated 19th June, in which he says—

"Sir,—Referring to my letter of the 15th inst. and to our later interview of Saturday afternoon, I now beg to inform you that I have since received from my Government the following cablegram :—'Full text of new Clause 74 sent through Tennyson to Australian Governors received. Consider it great improvement on previous Amendment, and request you will not offer any objection to it.' Consequently I will now accept on behalf of the Government of Queensland the new Clause 74 as presented to the House of Commons yesterday, and trust it may be passed unaltered. I desire, however, to record on behalf of my Government and of myself that we should have greatly preferred to have had the Bill as introduced by you passed without Amendment. May I suggest that further consideration be directed to the bearing of the words 'final and conclusive' in Clause 73, page 16, lines 27-28, in connection with new Clause 74? I cannot conclude without expressing to you my gratitude for the clear, straightforward manner in which you placed my attitude before Parliament in your speech of yesterday evening, and tendering you, on behalf of the Government of Queensland, our fullest appreciation of the great patience, care, and courtesy with which you have endeavoured successfully to reconcile views at first sight irreconcilable; trusting also that these long negotiations may now be considered as satisfactorily concluded."

Lastly, I received from the officer concerned in administering the government of Victoria a telegram dated the 21st of June, as follows—

"Ministers entirely approve clause now offered, and I am desired by them to convey their cordial thanks to you for your great trouble and kindly interest in our Australian matters, and to express our congratulations to you on having arrived at a successful settlement."

Now I think I may say that I have very great satisfaction in once more pressing for the Amendment which has been laid before the Committee. I do not myself regret in the least the time that has been spent in what I have heard described in some quarters as "muddling negotiations," but which have resulted in bringing absolutely into line the colony of Queensland, which was in favour of plenary appeal, and the colony of South Australia as representing the extreme views with regard to the restriction of the right of appeal. So far as four out of five of the federated States are concerned, the proposed arrangement has been accepted by all the delegates, thoroughly and cordially accepted. So far as New South Wales is concerned, we have still to wait for an expression of opinion on behalf of that colony, but in any case four out of five of the colonies have expressed their opinion, and, if I may venture to advise the Committee on the subject, I should say that, looking at the reports we have received from non-official sources, there can be very little doubt that they are equally acceptable to the vast majority of the people of New South Wales. They are equally acceptable to Her Majesty's Government. By this arrangement we have obtained everything for which we thought it our duty to contend, speaking on behalf of Imperial interests that are non-Australian. I have to repeat, after the most careful consideration, that we have secured in connection with the Australian federation precisely the same powers and rights of appeal which exist in the case of the great Dominion of Canada, with this trifling exception, which I am almost inclined to think is an improvement, that in certain rare cases the leave to appeal will be granted by the High Court in Australia, and not by the Privy Council. I have said that I think that that may possibly be an improvement, for this reason—that where the leave to appeal is to be given by the Privy Council it involves two applications to that body, which necessitates two sets of costs. The appellant has first to ask for leave; and, leave having been given, the merits of the case have to be tried. In this case leave will be settled by the local Court without the necessity of appealing. This Court, I imagine, will be considerably less expensive, and only the merits of the case will be tried by the Privy Council. I do not think I need refer to anything else except to say this—that my hon. and learned friend the Member for Haddingtonshire took me by surprise, in fact he astounded me, when he endeavoured to put forward the argument that either of these arrangements which we have recommended to the Committee as distinct from the original proposals of the Bill was really more restrictive of the right of appeal than the original Bill. I do not intend to argue with my hon. and learned friend, but what I have to say perfectly clearly is that the whole of Australia differs from him. Queensland—which, as I have said, was in favour of the plenary right of appeal—and the other colonies are in favour of a restricted right of appeal, but all of them have accepted the arrangement with the understanding that it very much enlarges the right of appeal which was conceded by the original Bill, and apparently they are now satisfied to accept the arrangement proposed by Her Majesty's Government as being in the interest of Australia as well as in the interests of this country.

*MR. HALDANE (Haddingtonshire): I wish to make one or two observations in reference to what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. It is quite true, as he said, that the Australian colonies have accepted this arrangement, but our contention was not in relation to anything which the Australian colonies were fighting for; our contention was that that should be preserved which the Australian colonies had already conceded. Our point was made in the interests of the Queen's dominions outside Australia, including those of New Zealand. The right hon. Gentleman was no doubt correct when he said that he had satisfied the Australian colonies with this clause. He has done so; but these colonies have been willing to concede something more than the right hon. Gentleman has got—namely, that where the interests of someone else outside themselves were in question the validity of those interests should be subject to appeal to the Privy Council. The right hon. Gentleman has said he has obtained everything which the Canadian Constitution gives with a trifling exception. What is that trifling exception? It is that there can be no appeal whatever to the Privy Council, except with the leave of the new High Court of Australia. Something like that question arose when the Canadian Constitution was under consideration, and the Canadian Supreme Court showed a tendency to take the view that it was the proper court to dispose of all questions of constitutional controversy, and that the Privy Council was not the place to appeal to. The Supreme Court of Canada conceived that its decisions should lay down the law finally as to questions arising between the Dominion and the provinces. What would have been the position of the provinces to-day if it had been left to the Supreme Court of Canada to say whether or not there should be an appeal? Does anyone imagine they would ever have got leave to appeal? I take it the Supreme Court, taking the view that it was properly the final court of appeal, would have refused leave. We do not want to run that risk here. The right hon. Gentleman talks of having settled with the Australian colonies, but there are other places to be dealt with besides the Australian colonies; New Zealand, for instance, which has large interests in this matter. The following letter, dated 19th June, 1900, deals with this matter. It was addressed to the Under Secretary for the Colonies by the Agent General of New Zealand.

"Sir,—I have the honour to further address you on the subject of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act.

"I have not had the opportunity of perusing any authenticated copy of the Amendment of Clause 74 which it is now proposed to insert in the Bill. Assuming, however, that the version published in The Times newspaper of this morning is correct, it appears to me that under it the position of outside States which may become involved in litigation with the Commonwealth or one of its provinces is open to doubt. I have read with attention the speech of the Attorney General, Sir Robert Finlay, but there seems to be at least a difference of opinion as to whether the right of appeal to the Privy Council may not be taken away in cases which involve at once the constitutional position of the Commonwealth in regard to its provinces and also the interests of some outside community. It is the earnest desire and request of the New Zealand Government that the present rights which our colony and colonists enjoy of appealing to the Privy Council may not be taken away, diminished, or left in any doubt whatever.

"I have, therefore, the honour to ask that her Majesty's Government may be pleased—if the point before referred to seems, on reflection, to admit of doubt—to insert in the clause such language as may put the matter beyond the possibility of controversy.

"My Government confidently believes that it is not the intention of the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies to allow the existing rights of any of Her Majesty's subjects outside the proposed Commonwealth to be impaired or abridged.

"The Australians themselves have never set up any claim to do this, and the request of the New Zealand Government would, therefore, seem to be in accordance with the manifest wishes of all parties.

"I am, etc.,

"W. P. REEVES."

That seems to represent the exact position, and reference to the Bill will show that in many respects the interests of New Zealand are likely to be vitally affected in the matter of trade, commerce, fisheries, etc. What objection can there possibly be to introducing this safeguard? Why not add words to the end of Clause 74—words which will restore the position of things before the unfortunate Amendment was made? To make the position of New Zealand clear I propose, when we come to Clause 74, to move to add words to provide that with respect to any question affecting the public interest of any part of the Queen's dominions outside the Commonwealth, the Privy Council may give leave to appeal. That seems to me to be most important, because New Zealand will not have any representative in the first instance at all in the High Court, certainly not before federation, and it would undoubtedly prevent the friction which did arise in the case of Canada. I can see no possible reason why the right hon. Gentleman should not, at any rate, consider these words, thereby giving that reasonable satisfaction to the people of New Zealand to which they are entitled.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Western Australia has been considered?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, Sir, I have communicated with Western Australia. It must be borne in mind that in the first instance we can only recognise directly the federating States. The opinion of others interested is important, but we cannot guide our decision by those outside the Commonwealth. I have received the following communication from the officer administering the government of Western Australia (received June 20th)—

"Ministers of opinion last proposal as to appeal of Privy Council preferable to proposal to allow Executive Government decide question. But Ministers strongly of opinion appeal from High Court should be by right and not by permission. Ministers think Federal Parliament should not have power to limit matters of appeal and that it should be made quite clear that existing right of appeal to Privy Council is maintained."

That is to say, Western Australia, like Queensland, and perhaps others who have not been communicated with in this matter, is in favour of my original proposal; but the arrangement which we have come to, and by which all are brought into line, is accepted.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I am sure both sides of the House will receive with a great deal of satisfaction the announcement made by the right hon. Gentleman that this prolonged quarrel has been now brought to a close, and that we may pass the Bill with the assurance that it will be satisfactory to the people of Australia. The right hon. Gentleman says that the delegates are satisfied with his latest arrangement, and he also says that it is perfectly satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government. I am rather surprised about that latter statement, because it seems to me that the right of appeal with the restrictions imposed by the present Act will become quite illusory. The appeals to this country have been very few, and not on matters of public interest to Australia. They will become fewer and more rare in the future, and in the natural course of things they will disappear altogether. There are very few cases at all likely to come to this country which are of interest to the public of Australia. It is said that certain questions affecting foreign affairs may be brought up and referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—appeals, for instance, in regard to New Caledonia and the islands possessed by Germany—but questions of that kind would never come into court. They would be brought to the notice of the Executive Government of the day. For instance, we have heard of cases with regard to the French shore of Newfoundland. No one would suggest that a question of that sort should be referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It is always a matter for negotiations between the French and British Governments. I think that this right of appeal will very soon, under the Act, fall into disuse, and I am perfectly convinced that that is the best thing which can happen to it.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University): I have very great diffidence in rising to attempt to controvert the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Haddingtonshire. I think, however, that the hon. and learned Gentleman has not sufficiently distinguished between the character of the constitution proposed in this Bill and the Canadian constitution. In the latter the Dominion and Provincial Legislatures have mutually exclusive powers of legislation. Here each State in the Commonwealth will have the fullest powers of legislation, affected only by the Colonial Laws Validity Act and the power of reservation and the ultimate power of disallowance. The Commonwealth will have limited powers of legislation, and therefore there can be no question of difficulty as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and the States.

MR. HALDANE: Will the hon. Gentleman permit me? He has overlooked Clause 109, which states that when the law of the State is inconsistent with the law of the Commonwealth, the latter should prevail.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON: I have not overlooked that clause. As long as the Commonwealth Parliament does not exceed its powers its legislation would countervail any legislation of a State; if it exceeds those powers the question becomes an Imperial one. I venture to think that difficulties are not likely to arise in matters of legislation, but rather in matters of executive action, and it is in that direction we have to look mainly, if not entirely, for the questions which may come to be decided, as between the Commonwealth and the States, by the High Court. If that is so I venture to think the hon. and learned Gentleman's fears are unfounded, and that the compromise, or the arrangement, or whatever else it may be, may be accepted by this House without any fear of trenching on Imperial interests or the interests of the colonies.

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.): I express no opinion on the controversy between my hon. and learned friend and the hon. Gentleman opposite. I rise for the purpose of saying that we are in a much more favourable position for dealing with this question now than we were on Monday last. In the interval the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies has had an opportunity of ascertaining the views of the colonies concerned, and even if this clause were open to more criticism than is the case, I think the general opinion of the Committee now is that having received the assent and approval of the colonies concerned, it ought to be carried into effect.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): I desire to say a very few words in explanation of the effect of this clause, by way of removing the apprehensions expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Haddingtonshire. I cannot but feel that these apprehensions are based on some failure to appreciate the true effect of the clause as it now stands. The first thing I wish to make perfectly clear to all concerned is this—that it will rest with the Privy Council to determine whether or not a particular matter falls within the restriction of this particular clause. The High Court will have no power to settle whether a particular matter falls within the restriction. On application to the Queen in Council the Judicial Committee would look into the whole matter, and if they were of opinion that it did not fall within the restriction, leave to appeal would be given whatever the opinion of the High Court might be. I cannot help thinking that the apprehensions expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman with reference to New Zealand are based on some misapprehension as to the essential differences between the Australian Bill and the British North America Act. It is perfectly true that Article 51 of this Constitution confers many powers on the Parliament of the Commonwealth which are almost identical in terms with those enumerated in Section 91 of the British North America Act. But in addition to the powers there enumerated there are certain most important powers not now enjoyed at all by any of the Australian colonies, such as powers with reference to foreign affairs, to fisheries beyond the territorial limits, and other matters of that kind. These powers are newly conferred on the Commonwealth, and with regard to them it will not be a question as between the Commonwealth and the States as to their distribution, because the States will possess, at all events, the most important of these new powers, including those in respect to which controversy is likely to arise. It will be a question not of distribution, but as to whether certain powers in respect to these matters have or have not been delegated to the Parliament and Government of the Commonwealth. So that there is absolutely no restriction by this clause as to an appeal to the Privy Council as to whether or not these powers have been so delegated. As the Bill came from Australia it might exclude absolutely any appeal whatever to Her Majesty in Council in these matters. The peculiar condition contained in the clause as it came from Australia—namely, if “the public interest in any other part of Her Majesty’s dominions” was concerned—is now set at rest by the settlement arrived at, and the right of appeal to Her Majesty in Council is introduced as regards these new powers not hitherto enjoyed by any of the colonies. Now we come to another aspect of the case to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred—that is, where a State has enjoyed certain powers, and where powers in respect of these matters have been conferred by this Bill upon the Parliament and the Government of the Commonwealth. Now, what I would direct the attention of my hon. and learned friend to is this: the scheme of this Bill is essentially different from the Canadian Bill. The Canadian Bill conferred, in respect of certain matters, exclusive powers upon the Parliament of the Dominion; in respect of certain other matters, exclusive powers upon the Legislatures of the Provinces; so that the form of the question which arose was this—whether or not the one or the other Parliament would be acting ultra vires if it meddled with a matter exclusively assigned to the other. That is not the scheme of this Bill at all.

Sir William Anson.

What has been done is this: on the Parliament of the Commonwealth are conferred, in respect of a number of matters, concurrent powers with those which have been enjoyed, and will still be enjoyed, by the Parliaments and the Governments of the States. The States in respect of these matters will still retain their powers, and the only question which can arise is as to whether any Act of the State Legislature will be ultra vires. In regard to Article 51 no controversy can arise as to any power having been taken away from the State Legislatures, because the States will retain all the powers they have enjoyed. The question that will arise is a totally different question. In the immense majority of cases it would not be whether the Commonwealth Parliament or the State Parliament had power to legislate on the matter, because both undoubtedly had. The scheme of the Bill is different. The question that would arise is this:—Under the 109th article of the Constitution, if the law of the Commonwealth and the laws of the State were in conflict, the law of the Commonwealth prevailed. The question would not be as to the relative powers of the Commonwealth and the States inter se, for in a question of the construction of the Commonwealth statute with the State statute, if they bore on the same subject, the Commonwealth law prevails. That is not a question which will be affected by the terms of the arrangement now arrived at. An appeal on the question of the construction of a statute will be absolutely free as at present. That is to say, if Her Majesty in Council thought fit to grant leave of appeal there would be no conflict. My hon. and learned friend referred to a very interesting case affecting a Chinaman, and he asked whether the State Legislature had not acted ultra vires in legislating on that subject. In Australia that question cannot arise, because no jurisdiction is conferred on the Commonwealth Parliament to legislate with regard to aliens, yet the State Legislature would retain all its powers, because the powers are concurrent. In regard to the other case mentioned by my hon. and learned friend as to rivers and lakes, the great rivers and lakes of America concern another Power than the Dominion of Canada; but no such question could, of course, arise in Australia, and therefore it could not lead to complication. I would point out, moreover, that the Amendment as proposed does not bear on an appeal in any class of cases whatever. As the Bill came from Australia, in certain classes of cases resting on the interpretation of some doubtful and obscure words there was no authority or power to give leave to appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council. There could be no appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council on any constitutional question unless it related to the public interests of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions. Now the effect of that was that in an excepted class of cases they set up two Courts with co-ordinate jurisdiction, and as to that particular class of case the High Court and the Privy Council are co-ordinate with no possibility of appeal from the one to the other. It might have been argued on the Bill as it came from Australia that the High Court in these cases would not have been bound by the decision of the Privy Council. No such contention can possibly be raised under the clause as it is now settled, because there is the power of appeal to Her Majesty in Council in every case. The only difference is that while in the immense majority of cases leave to appeal is to be granted as heretofore by application to Her Majesty in Council, such special leave in one small class of cases—which affect Australian interests almost exclusively—is to be granted from the High Court, and the Privy Council is recognised as the Appellate Court. It has been asked, if this leave is to be got from the High Court, on what principles will the High Court act in granting or refusing the application? I confess that I have some confidence in the action of the High Court. It has been the glory of our race all over the world, that the Judges in every part of the United Kingdom and in every British Colony have acted absolutely independently of political considerations. As these Judges have acted in the past I believe they will act in the future, and I think it will be found that there is no ground for any distrust or apprehension as to the way in which the High Court will exercise the powers with which it is entrusted in this very small and special class of cases as to whether there shall be an appeal to the Privy Council if the interests of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions are affected. It is very difficult indeed to see how a question of the distribution of powers between two

Australian States could affect the interests of another part of Her Majesty's dominions. But if by any human possibility such a case should arise, that is a special reason for allowing an appeal, and it is much better to have a provision in this elastic form instead of trying to find a form which will stand for all time without any power on the part of any Court to vary it. I would suggest to the Committee, and all those interested in the matter, that it may be left in the shape which it has now assumed—a shape that has given satisfaction alike to all those in Australia who approved of a limited appeal, and those who asked for an unrestricted appeal.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) : I entirely assent to the argument addressed to the House by my right hon. and learned friend that in cases which arise as to the powers of the Commonwealth Parliament and those of the State Parliaments, the decision should be left to the Privy Council ; in other words, it would be for the Privy Council to say whether the matter ought to come before it or not by way of appeal. In regard to the difference between the Canadian and this Constitution, that is not material ; but I think my hon. and learned friend goes rather too far if he suggests that it is absolutely impossible that a Constitutional question involving the public interests of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions can arise, where the question is, prima facie, one between the Constitution of a State and the Constitutional powers of the Commonwealth.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY : I did not say absolutely impossible. I think it is extremely improbable, and that it would be dealt with by the power which the High Court has to allow appeal on cause shown.

MR. BRYCE : I do not suggest that it is a probable case, but my hon. and learned friend the Member for Haddington was quite right in pointing out that this is a case that might arise, and that if it did it would have been better to have retained the words "public interests," which the original draft of the Australian Constitution contained, and which set of words had been used by the Privy Council itself in a famous decision. Probably it was from that decision that the words "public interests" in the original draft were drawn.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY : The words are "public interests in some other parts of Her Majesty's dominions."

MR. BRYCE : It is said that these are vague words. They are wide words, and the Privy Council would have given them a very wide interpretation. After all, there is not very much difference between us, and I pass on to enter a caveat against the last argument of my right hon. and learned friend. He suggested that under the Amendment the Committee is now discussing the High Court of the Commonwealth of Australia will not be a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with the Privy Council, and that it will be bound to follow the decisions of the Privy Council. I cannot feel by any means so clear as my right hon. and learned friend on that point, because we are here making a special provision for a special case. From the general right of appeal to the Privy Council to be granted we are excepting by statute one particular class of cases, questions involving the construction of the Constitution of the Commonwealth. Surely it will not only be within the power of, but also the duty and the right of the High Court to give full effect to that provision of the Australian Constitution, and to say, "We are in this particular matter made a final Court of Appeal. In all other matters we are undoubtedly a subordinate Court, unless in a particular matter we are made a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction." They would say, "The only appeal is to lie from us, where we are satisfied there is some special reason ; we are bound to carry out the intention of the people of Australia and of the Imperial Parliament in not going beyond the express provision ; they have given no appeal unless special reasons, in our opinion, exist." I think, therefore, that it will be open to the High Court in future to hold that in this matter they are a Court not of subordinate jurisdiction but of co-ordinate jurisdiction. I cannot assent to the argument that, because they are subject to appeal in other cases, they are subject to appeal in this case also.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY : They are subject to appeal in this case also ; the only question is whether that appeal

MR. BRYCE: Excuse me; it is whether they have it in their power, if they so think fit, to depart from the position given to them of being the final Court of Appeal, and put themselves in the position of a subordinate Court. I think it necessary to enter a protest against the view the Attorney General has taken on this point. I do not suggest that that is a reason why the matter should be thrown into uncertainty again, and I have no desire to raise any difficulty if it can possibly be avoided, but I think it would have been a great deal better if we had passed the Bill as it came to us from Australia. If the words the Australians employed had been used, some difficulties and friction would have been avoided. As, however, we have now arrived at an arrangement which appears to be satisfactory to the great majority of the Australian colonies, I do not think there will be any general wish in the Committee to throw any impediment in the way of the final settlement of the matter.

MR. HALDANE: I am glad that the Government have come to a satisfactory settlement with so many of the Australian colonies. I gather that Queensland would still like a wider appeal, and that Western Australia and New Zealand would like the appeal to the Privy Council to stand as at present. I do not intend to propose any Amendment, but would only suggest that between now and the Report stage it should be considered whether the words which the delegates originally proposed should not be preserved as an independent clause without in any way derogating from what has been done. In that way I think the views and wishes of New Zealand, Queensland, and Western Australia might be materially assisted. The right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General has shown the few cases in Canada which cannot arise; but he has not shown the number of cases which may arise. I quite agree that the two Acts will be materially different Acts, but the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General and the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary must remember that the cases of ultra vires under this Bill, although they will arise in a different form, will be just like the Canadian cases of ultra vires. The first form of question that will have to be decided would be, "Is the particular statute under consideration within the legislative limits?" That would raise a common form of question under the Canadian Constitution. Then there would be other questions. Supposing the Commonwealth legislated, under this very wide power of legislating, as to fisheries and extra-territorial waters, then, I think, New Zealand may very easily have a question on which it would be right that it should have an unfettered power of appeal. The desire of New Zealand that it should have an unfettered right of appeal seems to me to be only a reasonable desire, and I suggest to the Government, respectfully but earnestly, that they should give more consideration than they have done to the question of maintaining the original words as proposed by the delegates, if necessary in a separate and independent clause. Not one word has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman or the Attorney General to lead us to think that the delegates object to their original words. As New Zealand would not object, and Queensland and Western Australia both apparently prefer some better form of the clause, the old words should still be embodied in the Bill. If they are not, the Government must take the responsibility, and I can only say that we must congratulate the Government on getting as much assent as they have got.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not wish to prevent my hon. and learned friend from having the honours of war, but at the same time, as he has made a further appeal to the Government, I must be permitted to point out that there appears to me still to be an absolute and entire ignorance of the wishes of those he professes to represent. His appeal to us is to insert into this clause or some other part of the Bill, or to reinsert certain words; and he appears to think that if we did that we should give satisfaction to New Zealand, Queensland, and Western Australia. I beg to say he is entirely mistaken. I do not think either of those great colonies cares one row of brass pins whether we put those words in or not. What do they care about? There is something they do care about; these colonies have not got everything they want. From the very first, as I ex-
